LOVERS of Tennyson will be interested to hear that the Somersby estate is in the market. The centre of attraction there is, of course, the rectory, a picturesque rambling structure with a dining-room (filled by old Dr. Tennyson with spoils from the church), which externally resembles a chapel. The room in which the poet first saw the light overlooked the lawn, and the church, perhaps "the God's House" of "the Two Voices," where his father officiated, stands on a low hill opposite the house. The garden is full of associations of "In Memoriam," but it should be remembered that the trees are not as they were in Tennyson's time—"the towering sycamores" and "the poplars four" have gone, and the whole place is a wilderness. A "grey old grange," the reputed residence of "the Northern Farmer," stands close to the rectory, so close indeed that young Alfred Tennyson, by reaching out of one of the rectory windows, could steal the apple-tarts from the pantry of Barber, the tenant.

A little way from Somersby is "the brook that swerves to left and right thro' meadowy curves," passing in its course three mills, one of which may have suggested certain points in the landscape of "The Miller's Daughter." It is also the subject of the poem known as "The Brook." On the same estate there is a wooded dell, deep, wild, and shady, which is called "Holywell Glen." Here Tennyson wrote "Byron is dead." It is, not improbably, "the dreadful hollow" which "grides and clangs its leafless ribs and iron horns," and should appeal to readers of "Maud." Not too far away is Mablethorpe, perhaps "the lover's bay" mentioned in "The Golden Supper," and the seaside resort where Tennyson for the first time saw "the hollow ocean ridges roaring into cataracts." Spilsby, where Sir John Franklin was born, is within easy walking distance.

George Buchanan, whose quatercentenary will be celebrated shortly, and for an essay on whose works a prize of one hundred guineas has been offered, was, by the general consent of his contemporaries, the best Latin poet of his age, and also attained eminence as a writer of prose. He was born in February 1506 in the parish of Killearn in Stirlingshire, and went to study eventually at the University of Paris. On his return to Scotland he attacked the monastic system with great bitterness, his poem "Franciscanus" being an excellent specimen of classical Billingsgate. For this poem he was thrown some years later into a Portuguese prison where he made a translation of the Psalms, one of the chief pillars of his literary fame. In 1562 he was appointed tutor to Queen Mary, who invested him with the temporalities of Crossragwell Abbey.

Upon Mary's fall Buchanan became one of the tutors of James, afterwards James I. of England. When, later, he was charged with turning that Prince into a pedant, he replied that that was all that could be made of him. A fact not generally remembered is that he was for a short time King of Scotland. Having remarked in his royal pupil an excessive readiness for saying "yes," he one day presented him with two papers to sign. James after a few casual questions, affixed his signature, without having read either of them. One of them happened to be a transfer of the royal authority to Buchanan for fifteen days, and no sooner had the preceptor got it into his possession than he began to assume the demeanour of a monarch, even before James himself, who was at first alarmed and then convinced that the tutor was a lunatic. Buchanan thereupon produced the instrument which had formally invested him with the royal power, and no doubt added a salutary admonition to the youthful Sovereign.

Certain literary problems great and small have a way of cropping up again and again, and a small one has been exercising some correspondents of the Spectator for the past three or four weeks. This is the question of the authorship of "The Devil's Thoughts" (or "The Devil's Walk," to give it the name by which it is most frequently mentioned). In 1866, and in 1889, this question was fully dealt with in Notes and Queries; in a popular weekly it was discussed last year; and now some of the same old evidence is being adduced to bolster up the old story of Porson's authorship, some of the same details pro and con are being given in the Spectator. Unfortunately the contributors to this correspondence seem ignorant of the extent to which the matter was threshed out in 1866 and 1889: one of them for example, adduces one of Montagu's booklets of 1830—unaware that that worthy brought out two printings of the "Devil's Walks" in that year, ascribing one to Porson, and the other to Coleridge and Southey, and also producing as evidence a letter which appeared in the Morning Post of the same year, signed as though by a nephew of Porson's—a letter which has been stigmatised as a forgery or a hoax. The evidence in favour of Porson's authorship of the lines is really of the flimsiest and second hand, while that of the authorship of Coleridge and Southey is first hand, and has been accepted as conclusive by most inquirers who have gone fully into the matter.

"The Devil's Thoughts" appeared in its first form in the Morning Post of September 6, 1799 (Dykes Campbell's "Coleridge's Poems," p. 621), a fact which has not been sufficiently emphasised in disposing of the claims on behalf of Porson. At the time in question that great scholar was a close friend of (and brother-in-law to) Perry the editor of The Morning Chronicle—the Post's rival—and was a contributor to its columns. We understand that this poem—with the various imitations, &c., which followed at two distinct periods—has for some time been engaging the attention of Mr. Walter Jerrold, and that he will enter fully into the question of its authorship in his introduction to the small volume which he is preparing.

Friends of the late Sir Leslie Stephen, K.C.B., and of increased teaching of English literature in our Universities, will be glad to learn that the Leslie Stephen Lectureship in the University of Cambridge is now established. At the congregation held on April 27 last the necessary Graces were accepted and approved by the Senate. The sum of £630 contributed by the friends of the late Sir Leslie Stephen has been handed over to the University for the endowment of the lectureship. The lecture, which must be on some literary subject, including Criticism, Biography and Ethics, is to be delivered every two years. The first lecturer will be appointed in the Michaelmas Term of 1906 by the Vice-Chancellor, the Master of Trinity Hall, the Knightbridge Professor of Moral Philosophy, and the Regius Professor of Modern History.

A wise provision in the regulations is that they may be altered by Grace of the Senate at any time after January 1, 1935, provided that the name of Leslie Stephen be always connected with the foundation, and that the income arising therefrom be appropriated to some academical object of a literary character.

No better way of honouring the memory of Sir Leslie Stephen, philosopher, biographer, critic, could have been devised. Literary lectures of importance are too rare in our Universities, and the future generations of young students who listen to the Leslie Stephen lecture will doubtless acquaint themselves with the career and work of the man with whose name it is associated, and be encouraged thereby to enter the profession of literature in a similar spirit to that of the first editor of the "Dictionary of National Biography."

A more than usually interesting sale of books is promised at Messrs. Sotheby's on May 29, and the two following days. The books to be sold are the library of His Honour Judge Philbrick, K.C., and include specimens from the presses of Aldus, Fyner, John of Westphalia, Jenson, Schoeffer, Valdarfer and the Elzevirs, with bindings by Roger Payne, Bozerian, Padeloup, Derome and others. Perhaps the chief feature of the sale is the large number of editions of "Eikon Basilike" (catalogued as by Charles I.), from the original issue of 1648 (only seven copies known) with its many variants, down to the De La More Press reprint of 1903. There are also a number of editions and facsimiles of "The Compleat Angler," including the 1676 issue, which was the first edition of Cotton, and a good collection of La Fontaine, including the famous Fermiers-Généraux edition. Other treasures are Ravenscroft's "Rinetum Britannicum," and a coloured copy of Griffiths' "Palms of British India." There are also many works on Philately and on Napoleon.

On the 5th instant, according to the Standard, a Nonconformist minister was sent to Worcester Gaol for refusing to pay the education rate. To while away the tedium of his imprisonment, he took with him three books: "The Imitation of Christ," "The Commentaries of Cæsar," and "The Essays of Elia." His choice of the latter showed him to possess at least sound literary taste, and to be a wise man withal. The two former he was allowed to keep, but the line was drawn at Lamb's Essays. Why it would be impossible to hazard a conjecture. However, the point is to be settled, as Sir Henry Fowler has given notice to ask the Home Secretary the following tremendous questions: Whether he will say what authority is responsible for this action? on what grounds was this selection of books made? and whether the exercise of such authority meets with the sanction of the Prison Commissioners? How Charles Lamb would have chuckled at all this, and what a merry letter he would have written! It calls to mind his reply to Bernard Barton when the latter told him that it had been proposed to add "Elia" to the Woodbridge Book Club but that the book had been rejected. "Your account of my black-balling amused me. I think as Quakers they did right," adding, "there are some things hard to be understood," a remark that still holds good.

We have been reminded that Schiller was one of the foreigners who, at the time of the Revolution, were made citizens of France on the ground that they had "by their writings and their courage served the cause of liberty and prepared the way for the enfranchisement of the peoples." His companions in distinction were: Dr. Joseph Priestley, Thomas Paine, Jeremy Bentham, Wilberforce, Clarkson, Sir James Mackintosh, David Williams, Gorani, Anarsis Cloutz, Campe, Corneille Pauw, Pestalozzi, Washington, Hamilton, Maddison, Klopstock, and Kosciusko.

The clerk taking down this list of names, however, wrote that of Schiller as Gilleers. A copyist corrected Gilleers into Gille, and the notification of the honour was addressed to M. Gille, publiciste allemand, Allemagne. The letter consequently wandered about from post office to post office, and did not reach its destination until six years after its despatch. By that time some of the honorary citizens, and several of the signatories of the patent conferring the citizenship had been beheaded. "It is a diploma," Schiller said, "that comes to me from the kingdom of the dead."

Mr. George Moore's view that Schiller's power of writing poetry must have been limited by his possession of the Christian name of Frederick recalls the case of the Christ Church man of whom it was written, in an old work of humour entitled "The Oxford Menagerie," that "he goeth not to lectures for he saith: 'How can a man lecture in bags cut like that?'"

The task, however, of divining a man's genius from his Christian name is rendered difficult by the undeniable fact that men with the same Christian name have often had quite different kinds of genius. What point of resemblance would Mr. Moore guess to exist, supposing that, after his habit with the classics, he had never read a line written by any of them, between the characteristic gifts of Robert Burns and Robert Hichens; of Thomas Moore and Thomas Carlyle; of Theodore Hook and Sir Theodore Martin; of Edward Young and Edward Bulwer-Lytton; of Samuel Johnson and Samuel Langhorne Clemens; of Barry Cornwall, and Barry Pain; of Percy Shelley and Percy White; or, for that matter, of George Moore and George Herbert? Missing links are badly wanted in all these cases, and unless they can be supplied, the theory must break down.

Possibly the doctrine would be easier to maintain in the case of women writers. Among their names we find a good many that are outstanding and unique. There is only one Aphra, only one Felicia, only one Rhoda, only one Letitia in the world of letters. These names, therefore, may perfectly well mean something to the admirers of the works of the ladies who bore or bear them. But the difficulty crops up again with Charlotte. Does the name Charlotte suggest Charlotte Brontë or Charlotte Yonge? "Jane Eyre" or the "Heir of Redcliffe?" What can it conceivably suggest that is common to both of them? Is this a matter upon which Mr. Moore feels that he can throw light?

The British Weekly confirms the report which we have already mentioned that certain publishing houses have formed a Trust and mean to employ book-agents as their distributors instead of book-sellers. It is interesting to recall that this profession of American origin was once followed in San Francisco by Mr. Morley Roberts. This is the account which he gives of his experiences in The Western Avernus:

"I had to wander round the city with a large sample atlas under my arm, going into every place I thought might offer me a chance to dispose of one, and suffered during some days the misery of trying to induce a man who manifestly was not in need of my book to nevertheless buy it. The successful book-agent is a man who can read character, who is pliable, ready, quick-witted, and not to be repulsed. He must have brains, but cheek, or what is often called 'gall' in America, is far more necessary, and it was most difficult to find. I was lacking. I sold a few, and made 40 per cent. on my time and or 100 per cent. would not have compensated me for the day. I experienced in entering house after house for a while with perhaps only one success to be scored to me, and only too often I worked hard and made nothing at all. Finally, after three days which were absolutely blank, I sold my sample copy at a sacrifice, and renounced a business for which I was evidently unfit."

We should say that the business is one for which only a low type of man would be fit; and we should be sorry to see even good literature circulated by such odious means.

It is very unfortunate that there should be any question of the genuineness of the Corot lately presented by the Prince of Wales towards forming a nucleus for the proposed Irish Modern Gallery, but such doubts are likely to arise in the case of an artist whose good-nature sometimes triumphed over his artistic principles. Apart from those pictures which the dealers induced him to sell, though he thought them in no way representative of his art, there were those landscapes by imitators to which he is said to have given a few finishing touches to justify their attribution to his name. Messrs. Arnold and Tripp—the famous Parisian experts—seem inclined to acknowledge the authenticity of this work, as they consider it is impossible that an imitator could have produced it, while the painting of the trees betrays evident traces of the master's very early manner. On the other hand they consider it in no way representative of Corot's genius, and totally unlike that painter's more mature productions. It is sad to realise that we have only two unchallenged Corots in public collections in the British Isles.

A new Balzac story is told by the Gaulois. The novelist, it appears, flattered himself upon his skill in reading character from handwriting; and the story is of the test applied to his skill. A lady brought him an extract from the exercise-book of a twelve-year-old schoolboy, and asked for an opinion as to the youngster's character and prospects. Balzac inquired whether the child was her own. Answered in the negative, he examined the exercise carefully and delivered his judgment. "Madame," he said, "this child is thick-headed and frivolous. He will never come to any good. If he were my child, I would take him from school and put him to the plough." And then it had to be broken gently to the graphologist that the exercise on which he had pronounced so severely was one of his own which had been discovered hidden away between the leaves of an old lesson-book.

We have received a prospectus of "The Pioneers, a Society for producing original plays." It is a sensible and businesslike document. The society's motto is Acta non verba, and it does not "propose to bewail the decadence of the British drama." Those who heard Mr. Walkley's lectures on dramatic criticism at the Royal Institution will remember how old and fruitless a game that is. What the society does propose to do is to produce three new and original plays every year, and "merit will be the only passport to production." Good work has been done in the past by such societies; and though we are no great believers in the complaint that good work gets no chance, it is quite possible that the Pioneers will discover much clever and interesting matter which the professional managers have overlooked or found unsuitable to the conditions under which the theatre is now controlled. Particulars can be obtained from the General Manager, Mr. Herbert Swears, Upland, Hadley Wood.

Another society, the "English Drama Society," is to give, at the Bijou Theatre, Archer Street, W., on June 18, a performance of Browning's In a Balcony.

Mr. W. S. Gilbert's comedy The Palace of Truth will be the next production by the Mermaid Repertory Theatre at Great Queen Street. It will be given on Monday evening next and during the week, with matinee on Saturday and rehearsals are now proceeding under the direction of the author.

Recent French publications of interest are: Maxim Gorki, "En Prison"; Comte d'Haussonville, "Mon Journal pendant la Guerre (1870-71)," edited by his son; André Bellesort, "La Roumanie Contemporaine"; the third volume of H. Taine, "Sa vie et sa correspondance" (1870-1875), of which we may doubtless also expect the English translation shortly; C. de Freycinet, "La Question d'Egypte," and Dmitry de Mérejkowsky, Pierre et Alexis Antechrist.

LITERATURE

THREE GREAT NOVELS

Vanity Fair. By W. M. THACKERAY (Macmillan, 2s. net);
Waverley. By Sir WALTER SCOTT (Macmillan, 2s. net);
The Pickwick Papers. By CHARLES DICKENS. (Macmillan, 2s. net.)

THE charming reprints before us of three works by the greatest exponents of the art of fiction in the nineteenth century suggest many thoughts and many comparisons. They are all books written at the beginning of the authors' careers, although, as it happens, both Thackeray and Scott were middle-aged before they took to this kind of writing. Dickens, however, was quite youthful when he wrote the "Pickwick Papers," and it is interesting to think that this book is in many respects the best of all his works. Even the fastidious few who do not greatly love Dickens usually make an exception in the case of the "Pickwick Papers." Here his sentimentality is kept in check, as is his love of pathos naked and unashamed; while the touch of exaggeration is less offensive in an avowedly humorous book than it would be in any other. Besides, "Pickwick" has all the spirit and go of high youth about it. The author never flags and the reader is carried from chapter to chapter by his infectious enthusiasm. Yet, at the same time, a careful critic would easily be able to show the beginnings of those faults that marred his later work. Several of the characters are merely labels and not real persons. Sergeant Buzfuz, for example, is only an exaggeration of certain faults in the lawyer common enough in the time, while the landlady, the attorneys, the adventurer and his servant, are somewhat mechanically built, as if Dickens had seized on one characteristic, and endowed them with it to the exclusion of everything else. But with all its faults "Pickwick" must still be numbered among the masterpieces of youth, though the innumerable legions of those who have imitated its author have followed its lines less than those of any other of his novels.

The difference between Dickens and Thackeray has often been pointed out, and it would be idle to raise once more the controversy as to which was the greater. A close study of the two, however, would go far to show that Thackeray was influenced by Dickens much more than would at first sight be thought. We are apt to forget nowadays the lofty position which Boz achieved almost at a first effort. He represented success in its most brilliant form, and there were few of his own day and generation who would have ventured even to think, far less to point out, that his most popular works were knocked together with rough tools, and represented no fineness of literary craftsmanship. He had many things temporarily in his favour, not the least of which was that he employed his novels as vehicles for the conveyance of political and moral lessons. It was a time when the idea of self-improvement was in the air, and people lost sight of the elementary truth that if literature be a faithful mirror of life it will teach exactly what life teaches and no more. At the moment when the writer becomes conscious of a moral purpose he ceases to achieve it, because the very fact leads to distortion and consequent falsehood. To picture life truly, to set forth in an undying record the true and genuine impression that it has made in his own mind, is the only right ambition of the artist. It may possibly end in failure after all, and will assuredly do so unless the writer be possessed of clear insight to begin with. Should he take any fantastic or distorted view of life, that will inevitably be apparent in his work and render it of less worth than it would otherwise have been. Thus, high motive is not in itself any guarantee of greatness. It may perhaps be that Thackeray was less earnest and strenuous than Dickens, though we are not inclined to think so. Carlyle, who had the gift of looking deep into the hearts of his fellow men, thought otherwise, and on the contrary deemed Thackeray in danger of being torn to pieces by his own intense thoughts and sentiments. The cynicism of which we used to hear so much was only a mask worn by kindness, and, indeed, it scarcely ever deserved the name. But, on the other hand, Thackeray also had a self-consciousness that operated against his work. All that crusade of his against snobs only proves that he was not himself without a touch of the very vice he was lashing. The plain, direct and simple man moves among his fellow creatures in a single-heartedness which will take no conscious note of what is called snobbishness. And here again we come to the elementary truth that pure literature will never be a crusade against any human weakness any more than it will be written for the purpose of teaching a moral lesson. There is a tendency just now to revolt against the doctrine which has been called "Art for Art's sake," and it is not a bad tendency. But instead of Art it is Nature that has to be studied. To hold the mirror up to Nature—that was Shakespeare's definition, and it has never been bettered.

Thackeray and Dickens, too, represented two widely different manners. We are speaking at present not of their personal character but of what was developed in their writing. Dickens was in the habit of gushing. He, as it were, shook hands with you in a violent manner, sympathised loudly and painfully with you in your distresses, gave you many good wishes in the most emphatic manner, and parted from you with a farewell of exaggerated pathos. At the back of these phenomena no doubt there was a fine and genuine man, but his personality found an expression exactly opposite to that of Thackeray, who was really an apostle of the informal that has now come to reign in Great Britain. No one could have imagined Thackeray punctiliously observing the stately ceremoniousness that used to be characteristic of English society, a ceremoniousness strikingly exemplified in some of the conversations written down by his predecessor, Sir Walter Scott. We would take an example of it from a conversation between two lovers in "Waverley":

"But, dearest Flora, how is your enthusiastic zeal for the exiled family inconsistent with my happiness?"

"Because you seek, or ought to seek, in the object of your attachment a heart whose principal delight should be in augmenting your domestic felicity, and returning your affection, even to the height of romance. To a man of less keen sensibility and less enthusiastic tenderness of disposition, Flora Mac-Ivor might give content, if not happiness; for were the irrevocable words spoken, never would she be deficient in the duties which she vowed."

"And why, why, Miss Mac-Ivor, should you think yourself a more valuable treasure to one who is less capable of loving, of admiring you, than to me?"

"Simply because the tone of our affections would be more in unison, and because his more blunted sensibility would not require the return of enthusiasm which I have not to bestow."

It is very obvious that the conversation of Harry Foker was more to Thackeray's taste than the rounded periods, the balanced rhythm, and the careful grammar, in which Edward Waverley and Flora Mac-Ivor exchanged sentiments. It is easy to imagine Thackeray meeting with his dearest friend, or parting from him, and showing no greater sign of emotion than an indifferent "How do you do?" or "Good-bye." He is always giving one the idea of holding his feelings in restraint, and by no more than the depression of an eyebrow giving a hint occasionally of emotion that he would rather the world did not know of. And in this Thackeray has conquered. It is the informal that reigns in English society to-day, and is penetrating far beyond society into the regions of politics, religion, literature, and art. In fact the whole twentieth century might be likened to one of those artists at the music-halls who, while performing the most prodigious feats of strength or skill, smoke their cigarettes and make trifling remarks to the audience as though what they were doing were the most commonplace thing in the world. So with our century. We know by the results that men are living most strenuously while at the same time the smile they wear would lead one to believe that they knew neither work nor care. We cannot be far wrong in attributing this change, in part at least, to the influence of Thackeray and of the many good and true men who were his acquaintances in life and caught up and transmitted his ideas. To enforce the truth of what we have said it is not necessary to go further than the third person in our trio—Sir Walter Scott. He would indeed be no critic who attempted to argue that the good Sir Walter was not guilty of nearly every defect of style conceivable. He produced those long introductions which, as an old writer said, "putteth off the reader." He was often prolix to the verge of tiresomeness. His descriptions of Nature are often dragged into the page by the scruff of the neck. His English is clumsy and often hopelessly involved, and, as we have seen, he represented the formal exactly as he found it, or it may be a little more so. These are faults that the veriest tyro may find in his work and that have induced more than one modern genius to attempt to re-write it. Yet in spite of all these defects Sir Walter Scott holds his own at the very top of English novel writers, and we doubt if even his master Fielding can seriously dispute the place with him. But Scott had to an eminent degree that unconsciousness we have spoken of. Like others, he had lived and suffered—suffered more than the world was aware of until the publication of his Diary revealed it; only he never esteemed it as anything else but his duty to bear grief like a man and to go on fighting valiantly as long as he had strength enough left to do it. To him the world of his own day and the world of the past were equally but fleeting pageants, with points full of interest, it is true, but not to be searched with any set purpose of finding out what was good and what was evil in them. When his imagination brought before him a band of moss-troopers or rievvers, riding down a valley laughing and talking and swearing, it was not their morality or immorality that he saw; it was only a brilliant picture of a world that had passed away. And to a greater degree than almost any other writer he had the divinest of gifts, that of sympathy, so that it was comparatively easy to him to enter into and realise the life and ideals of the most ordinary hind on his estate and of the greatest of the great dead kings. Here was splendid material for imaginative literature, of which he made such use that his name towers, and is ever likely to tower, above that of every one else who has tried to do the same kind of work.

AN INARTICULATE SAVANT

The Progress of Hellenism in Alexander's Empire. By JOHN PENTLAND MAHAFFY, C.V.O., D.D., D.C.L. Sometime Professor of Ancient History in the University of Dublin. (Unwin, 5s.)

THERE is a certain advantage in having made one's self master of a branch of knowledge which nobody else has taken up. The expert can say what he pleases: and if any one thinks fit to contradict or criticise the expert, he does so at his own risk. At the same time, the solitary savant must beware how he ventures into fields of knowledge in which he may have rivals. If, in any such aberrations, he falls into any blunder, the consequences do not end with the exposure of the particular error. A presumption is raised that the expert may be wrong in matters where no one can set him right, seeing that he has gone wrong in matters where he can be corrected. Dr. Mahaffy has made himself master of the period of Grecian history known as that of the Diadochi, or Successors of Alexander the Great. It is a period which has been comparatively neglected by almost every historian, probably because historians previous to Dr. Mahaffy found it quite uninteresting. Our learned author may therefore claim immunity from criticism when he is discoursing on the career of an Antigonos, an Antiochus, or a Seleucus. We will not add a Ptolemy, because there really are people who know something of Egyptian history besides Dr. Mahaffy. In this notice it is not our intention to poach on the more strictly preserved grounds of post-Alexandrian history. Our author has in this book travelled beyond his own exclusive domain. Whether the excursus has or has not been attended by happy results must be left to the reader to judge.

The very title of the book invites criticism. Strictly speaking, the word Hellenism is hardly correct. Dr. Mahaffy, in his preliminary lecture admits that he uses the word in a merely colloquial sense, so that it is only necessary for the reviewer to caution the reader against any confusion of thought. We may point out that the author's erudition does not appear to include one very notable fact. The name used in Asia for "Greece" or "Greek" was not, and is not, "Hellen" but "Yunan" or "Yunani," i.e., Ionia or Ionian. In the Acharnians of Aristophanes the Persian envoy calls the Athenians "Iaones" (Acharnians 104—the same form is found in Æschylus' Persæ and in more than one passage of the "Iliad"). To come down to our own time, the town of Jaunpur on the eastern frontier of Hindostan, almost in Bihar, is Yavanpur, equivalent to Ionopolis, or Ionian-town. It is a remarkable fact that the name "Ionian" should have survived to this day, in spite of the adoption of the name "Hellen" in the New Testament, and also in the Apocrypha. Dr. Mahaffy would, of course, be entitled to claim the scriptural use of the word "Hellen" as proof of the correctness of his title. It is curious, however, that he should have ignored the survival of the name "Ionian" and the disuse of "Hellen."

We pass to another and more important topic of criticism. Dr. Mahaffy evidently claims for himself the status of a philosophical historian. It is worth while to examine briefly the value of his claim. In the lecture headed "Macedonia and Greece," at page 32 the text says:

"Had Alexander been killed in his first mêlée at the Granikos . . . the whole history of Hellenism would have been changed and its progress delayed till some other organising and conquering genius had arisen. It was therefore to the King of Macedon, leading his own people, that the first great spread of Hellenism is directly due." And then follows a note:—"At no moment, by the way, does the now somewhat fashionable theory, that national movements are everything, and individuals nothing, in history, appear to me more absurd. To tell me that the conquest of the East was in the air, and that some other Alexander would have carried out the national desire, had the son of Philip been killed at the outset of his career, is to tell me what no man could possibly prove, and what runs counter to all the experience we possess."

Of course no man could possibly prove any such thing, and to use the word "prove" is to prove the writer guilty of slovenly and irrelevant thought. Furthermore, Dr. Mahaffy mis-states what he calls "the now somewhat fashionable theory." Nobody ever said that national movements are everything and individuals nothing. It would take up too much space to set forth in detail the theory which our author has inaccurately summarised; but we can show in his own words that he himself has enunciated the doctrine which he denounces. In the chapter headed "Xenophon the Precursor," at page 15 we read:

"The campaign of the Spartan King Agesilaus in Asia Minor, where he was attended, and no doubt advised, by Xenophon, pointed to a large invasion of the East, and had he not been recalled by the miserable dissensions and quarrels of Greece, the conquest, partial if not total, of the Persian empire was in near prospect."

If this is not saying that the conquest of the East was in the air, and that if Alexander had not led a Greek invasion of Persia some one else would, there is no meaning in language. But, indeed, in Dr. Mahaffy's language there seldom is any meaning—and when there is, more often than not it is something quite different from what he intended to convey. For instance, at page 71 we read:

"So active was the trade in books copied by slaves from the originals in the Museum, and sold over the world, that a conflagration among the ships in the harbour during Julius Cæsar's campaign spread to the stores on the shore and destroyed so many books that the accident was by-and-by magnified into the destruction of the great library itself."

What he seems to mean is that the activity of the trade in books is shown by the large number of books in stores on the shore which were consumed by a conflagration spreading from the ships in the harbour. We know of no parallel to the construction of this paragraph except the well-known sentence pronounced by the late Mr. Justice Joseph Miller.

"Prisoner at the bar, Providence has blessed you with health, strength and abilities—instead of which, a jury of your country has found you guilty of stealing ducks!"

In a former work—"Principles of the Art of Conversation"—Dr. Mahaffy enunciated the axiom that "even too careful an attention to grammar and the careful rounding of periods in easy intercourse is apt to be tedious and should be avoided." He appears to have extended his conversational rule so as to apply to literary composition. His vocabulary is as eccentric as his grammar. He repeatedly uses the word "parochial" to designate the local politics of Greek states. At page 36 he calls Eumenes "Alexander's intimate secretary." This is not English. "Private secretary" is in French secrétaire intime; but intimate secretary is the kind of English which the Vicomte de Florac talked in Thackeray's novel. "He annoys me, the domestic veal!"

An abuse of language which amounts to a vulgarity is to be found at page 58. "The country was broken up into four sections, and in each of them was established what was called in the shibboleth of that day a free constitution, &c. &c." One hardly knows how to begin rebuking ignorance such as this phrase implies. The etymology and meaning of the word "Shibboleth" should be known to every one who can read his Bible. We observe, indeed, that in certain very recent dictionaries it is interpreted "a watchword or party cry:" but this is an obvious error. At any rate it never meant "popular phraseology;" yet that is what it must mean, used as Dr. Mahaffy uses it. The fact is that it has become a cant vituperative phrase in the speeches and writings of modern Fiscal Reformers, for use against Free Traders; and Dr. Mahaffy is nothing if not modern. So much for his vocabulary—and his grammar is no better. A favourite blunder is to make a singular nominative govern a plural verb, because the singular nominative may be construed as a noun of multitude. "Endless compromising correspondence were seized, &c."—p. 56. "A strolling company of Greek players were performing the Bacchæ"—p. 99. "A careful study of the relations of the Pergamene kings to their city and people disclose, &c.," p. 100. In the last case there is not even the excuse of a supposed noun of multitude. We imagine that it is because the lectures were delivered at Chicago, that we find at p. 14, "there were so many women that their outcry was quite a feature in the camp." We knew that French and German affected the learned historian's diction—but we were hardly prepared for Americanism. Then at p. 7 (perhaps we ought to apologise for rambling references), we are told that Xenophon

"allows himself the use of stray and strange words provincial in the sense of not being Attic, picked up in his travels at Sinope or Samos or Byzantium, and often appearing but once in his works."

In the note to the same page we find e.g., where the proper abbreviation would be i.e.—but perhaps that is a misprint. Not to be wearisome, we will just quote one more blunder. At p. 122 we find "God made the country, but the devil made the towns" quoted as an "old adage." Is it possible that Dr. Mahaffy had in his mind Cowper's "God made the country and man made the town"? He needed to go no farther than a dictionary of familiar quotations to trace the "adage;" and had he done so he would have found that Cowley had long before written: "God the first garden made and the first city Cain."

We need say no more. We have not striven to follow Dr. Mahaffy into the province of history in which he claims to be a solitary expert, but we have seen that in dealing with those portions of history which are matters of common knowledge he has been guilty of inaccuracy in his facts and of bad logic in his reasoning. The slovenliness of his style is disgraceful, suggesting Fergus Hume or the Family Herald rather than a Fellow and Professor of a great University. In all our reading we have come across only one worse written book than "The Progress of Hellenism," and that is Dr. Mahaffy's "Principles of the Art of Conversation."

AN AMERICAN AMBASSADOR

Autobiography of Mr. Andrew Dickson White. Two vols. (Macmillan, 30s. net.)

No man has better opportunities for observation of men and things than a modern ambassador. He is the Ulysses of our days. If he will take the trouble to exercise his memory and keep a diary—two parts of the same discipline—he cannot fail to feed history.

Mr. Andrew White, the distinguished American scholar and diplomat, now a veteran of over seventy years, has had rare opportunities of this kind, and has used them well. He has been twice accredited by the American Government both to Berlin and St. Petersburg. He was the chief American delegate at the Hague Convention. He has seen many countries and known many men. In Germany he has been on intimate terms with two generations of great men, with the men of Bismarck's day and the men of William II.'s. In Russia he has known three Czars, and spent days with Tolstoy and Pobedonostzeff. He has seen all parties and heard all sides: and he has brought to this record rare powers of observation and reflection.

The result is the present book, the Odyssey of an old man who has already girded his loins for a longer journey. It contains many chapters, varying in importance—some interesting chiefly to Americans, others to all students of human nature. But what will interest Englishmen chiefly will be Mr. White's impressions of famous European characters, and, even more, his records of their conversations.

At the present moment the world eagerly listens to anything at first hand about the characters of the chief actor in the Russian drama—we had almost said, tragedy. Mr. Andrew White knows Russia well and all the chief characters in St. Petersburg. Of the Czar Nicholas II. he holds a very poor opinion. He sums him up as a man who knows nothing about his own country. Mr. White certainly had a very unfortunate experience with Nicholas. He went to him, when heir to the throne, at the time of the Russian famine:—

"I spoke on the general subject to him, referring to the fact that he was President of the Imperial Relief Commission. He answered that since the crops of the last year there was no longer any suffering; that there was no famine worthy of mention; and that he was no longer giving attention to the subject. This was said in an off-hand easy-going way which appalled me. The simple fact was that the famine, though not so widespread, was more trying than during the year before; . . . and yet his Imperial Highness the heir to the throne evidently knew nothing of all this."

But would it be impossible to find an English minister equally ignorant—say, about India?

Mr. White gives a fairer, because more sympathetic, impression of his friend Tolstoy. He describes with great effect a day with him at Moscow:

"We went out for a stroll. As we passed along the streets I noticed especially what I had remarked during our previous walks, that Tolstoy had a large quantity of small Russian coins in his pockets; that this was evidently known to the swarms of beggars who infest the Kremlin and the public places generally; and that he always gave to them."

Mr. Andrew White thinks that the isolation of Tolstoy's mind on many points is due to want of travel and intercourse with other minds:

"Incidentally I expressed wonder that he had not travelled more. He then spoke with some disapprobation of travel. He had lived abroad for a time, he said, and in St. Petersburg a few years, but the rest of his life had been spent mainly in Moscow and the interior of Russia. The more we talked together the more it became clear that this last statement explained some of his main defects."

Readers of history will not be surprised to learn from Mr. White that the famous Pobedonostzeff, whose religious persecutions have caused such misery to thousands in Russia and Finland, is a man of the mildest character and conversation. The most striking pen-portrait of him is perhaps this:

"During my recent stay in Germany he visited me at the Berlin Embassy. He was, as of old, apparently gentle, kindly, interested in literature, not interested to any great extent in current Western politics. This gentle, kindly manner of his brought back forcibly to my mind a remark of one of the most cultivated women I met in Russia, a princess of ancient lineage, who ardently desired reasonable reforms, and who, when I mentioned to her that Pobedonostzeff was weary of political life and was about to retire from office in order to devote himself to literary pursuits, said: 'Don't I beg of you tell me that; for I have always noticed that whenever such a report is circulated, it is followed by some new scheme of his, even more infernal than those preceding it.'"

We confess to a great sympathy with that lady. These mild Torquemadas are probably more easily appreciated by ambassadors with territorial rights than by their own countrymen.

One of Mr. White's great admirations is for the Emperor William II. He devotes a very interesting chapter to a discussion of his character and a record of many conversations. There again, the Ambassador's point of view is one thing; and the German's possibly another. But the Emperor suffers so much from abuse and obloquy of one kind or another that it is refreshing to meet with an outspoken admirer. Mr. White gives us one new and very vivid impression:

"It was interesting from time to time to look over the official lists of his guests at breakfast or luncheon, or dinner or supper or at military affairs, in literature, science, art, commerce or industry from every nation. One class was conspicuous by its absence at all such gatherings, large or small; namely, the merely rich. Rich men there were, but they were always men who had done something of marked value to their country or to mankind; for the mere 'fatty tumours' of the financial world he evidently cared nothing."

That strikes the note of a pure Court.

Mr. White tells one story which illustrates a personal affinity now almost a commonplace of politics. He was visiting President Roosevelt:

"At the close of the message (to the Emperor William), which referred to sundry matters of current business, came a playful postlude. 'Tell his Majesty,' said the President, 'that I am a hunter and, as such, envy him one thing especially; he has done what I have never yet been able to do—he has killed a whale. But I say to him that if he will come to the United States, I will take him to the Rocky Mountains to hunt the lions, which is no bad sport—and that if he kills one as he doubtless will, he will be the first monarch who has killed a lion since Tiglath-Pileser.' I needly hardly add that when, a few weeks later, I delivered the message to the Emperor at Potsdam, it pleased him."

So hunter cries unto hunter across the wastes of ocean.

Mr. Andrew White has a keen sense for the humorous side of an Ambassador's life, and gives some very amusing illustrations of it. Perhaps this is the best:

"One morning the mail brought me a large packet filled with little squares of cheap cotton cloth; I was greatly puzzled to know their purpose until, a few days later, there came a letter which, with changes of proper names, ran as follows:

"SIR,—We are going to have a fancy fair for the benefit of the Church in this town and we are getting ready some autograph bed quilts. I have sent you a package of small squares of cotton cloth, which please take to the Emperor William and his wife, also to Prince Bismarck and the other princes and leading persons of Germany, asking them to write their names on them and send them to me as soon as possible."

"Yours truly,

"P.S.—Tell them to be sure to write their names in the middle of the pieces for fear their autographs may get sewed in."

American Ambassadors have always been very popular in this country; and the echo of one sad farewell still sounds in our ears. This charming and modest record of a noble and well-spent life will add to the welcome of Mr. Choate's successor.

THE CORRECTED ENGLISH NEW TESTAMENT

The Corrected English New Testament: A Revision of "the Authorised" Version. By Nestle's Resultant Text, with a Preface by the BISHOP OF DURHAM. (Bagster, 6s. net.)

THE avowed object of this version is to present to the English reader "the beauty, the dignity, the force and the rhythm of the 'Authorised' version, but forming a clearer and more accurate representation of the Greek Text." A careful examination of its merits and demerits leaves the impression that the results scarcely correspond with the lofty ideal of the translators. In too many cases the Greek text is scarcely represented with the clearness and accuracy expected. None the less, it is not without considerable merit in its occasional improved diction and in many felicitous and faithful renderings of the original. Accordingly one can only endorse the qualified commendation of so high an authority as the Bishop of Durham, who regards "the work, taken as a whole, as a very important and faithful contribution to the great and necessarily gradual work of providing an ultimate ideal English Bible."

When compared with the Authorised and the Revised Versions, it will be found that the present translators have in most cases substantially accepted the renderings of the Revised Version, rather than those of the Authorised. "Ἀγάπη," for example, in 1 Cor. xiii. 1, is rendered "love" as elsewhere, not "charity." St. John x. 16, "one flock" instead of "one fold," and Revelation vii. 2 (Revised Version) "living creatures" and present version "living beings" instead of Authorised Version "beasts." Here we prefer the Revised rendering. Again, these translators have in most cases carried out Bishop Lightfoot's canon in rendering the same Greek word by the same English equivalent wherever it occurs, and so have followed the Revised Version, but yet they have occasionally violated the rule in the selfsame passages. In St. Matt. vi. 30, 31, for instance, both the Revised and the present version give "clothed" as a rendering for two different verbs, but in v. 29 the Revised Version gives the Authorised "arrayed," while this Corrected Version gives "clothe," so we have the same English word used by these translators for three distinct Greek verbs which have three distinct meanings. Further, in Revelation vii. 9 we find "clothed in white robes," where the Revised Version and the Authorised Version rightly give "arrayed"—the term used in describing, in St. Matthew, "Solomon in all his glory." This is not only a matter of inconsistent rendering of the Greek, but what is more, it violates both a sound critical rule, and the proposal of these translators "to adapt and not supersede the elevated and simple diction of the Authorised Version." The old translators of the English Bible did much better in representing the different meanings of the different Greek verbs in the passages quoted.

As a fair specimen alike of its merits and demerits, we quote Acts xvii. 21 &c.: "Now all the Athenians and the strangers sojourning there spent their leisure in nothing else, than either telling or hearing the last new thing. Then Paul stood up in the midst of the Areopagus, and said, Ye men of Athens, I perceive that in every respect ye are unusually religious. For, as I passed by, and observed the objects of your worship, I found an altar with this inscription, 'To the Unknown God.' Therefore, what ye in ignorance worship, I set forth to you. God who made the world and all things therein, seeing that He is Lord of heaven and earth, dwelleth not in sanctuaries made by hands; neither is He ministered to by men's hands, as if He needed any thing, seeing that to all He is Himself the giver of life, and breath, and all things. And He made out of one every nation of men to dwell on every face of the earth, and determined the appointed times, and the bounds of their habitation." "Spent their leisure" is certainly closer to the Greek than the Authorised Version, or the Revised Version "spent their time," though the latter has placed it in the "margin," not in the text. "Unusually religious" for the Revised "somewhat superstitious" (with "religious" in the margin) and for the Authorised "too superstitious" is by no means an improvement, as it does not so well harmonise with the text and the context, and is opposed to all the renderings of the English Bible—Roman Catholic or Protestant—from Wycliffe to the present time. The objections to such a rendering are briefly these:

(1) The Greek term for "unusually religious" or God-fearing is διαφερόντως θεοσεβείς as we see from Plutarch. This would be more expressive of "religious" than διδαιμονιστέρους, which is generally used in a bad sense, as somewhat superstitious, and rarely in a good sense. It is certainly remarkable that Lord Bacon thinks that it were better to have no opinion of God at all than one unworthy of Him, which he terms superstition, a view similar to Plutarch's, who considers disbelief, ἀπίστια, a terrible thing, but superstition, διδαιμονία, a still more terrible thing. Again, Theophrastus, Menander, Aristotle, Polybius and others, all use it in a bad sense, that of a superstitious person.

(2) From the context it is clear that St. Paul was deeply exasperated in soul, as he beheld the city filled with idols—and the only redeeming point he found was "the altar to an Unknown God," because it gave him the opportunity of making known to the Athenians the God they worshipped in ignorance. To this "unknown god," no temple or idol was dedicated, but only an altar, "the outcome of superstition"—διδαιμονία, as Dr. Chase, the Cambridge Professor of Divinity, writes, for "in some visitation of plague or famine it was not obvious what god needed propitiation. Fear suggested an expedient. An altar was erected to the god, whosoever he might be, whose hand was heavy on the people. No name could be assigned to him; the inscription must needs be, 'To the unknown God.'"

(3) "Too superstitious" has the support of the Latin Vulgate, St. Augustine, Luther, Bishop Wordsworth and Dr. Field (a Reviser), and of other eminent authorities. It seems more than probable that the comparative degree of the Greek adjective here was intended to soften the Apostle's charge of idolatry and superstition, as "rather too superstitious."

(4) This charge of superstition and idolatry in the Acts of the Apostles by St. Paul is only in harmony with his Epistles, as he writes in those to the Romans, to the Thessalonians and Ephesians and Corinthians who were amongst the nations "who knew not God," and were "without God (ἄθεοι) in the world;" in other words, that they were superstitious rather than religious.

The rendering "dwelleth not in sanctuaries" is far away better than that of the Authorised Version and Revised Version, which give "temples," though the latter places "sanctuaries" in the margin. This distinction here and elsewhere drawn between "temple" and "sanctuary" is one of the leading merits of the present version, and closer to the Greek in every respect. For "sanctuary" represents ναὸς (the Holy of Holies), where the Deity dwells (ναίει), while ἱερόν the "temple" strictly applies only to the rest of the sacred building. So too in 1 Cor. iii. 16, this version well renders: "Know ye not that ye are a 'sanctuary' of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you," where the Authorised Version and Revised Version render by "temple" and so obscure the harmony and force of the Apostle's comparison and argument. On the other hand the strange expression here of "every face of the earth" seems something like simple nonsense, when compared with the simple sense of "all the face of the earth" as in the Authorised Version and Revised Version. Again here as elsewhere in this version one finds a disregard of the manner of the original in its harmony of terms, which forms one of its marked features and adds much to its force and beauty, as where St. Paul answers the charge of "setting forth strange gods"—and to translate more accurately answers: "What (neuter) therefore ye unknowingly worship, that I set forth unto you" (unknowingly answering to the unknown God), and "I set forth"—answering to "a setter forth of strange gods."

The chief defects of this version are those of nearly every other English translation. It equally disregards the immediate force of the Aorist in non-Indicative moods, the full force of compounds and the force of the emphatic adjective in Greek. Take for example ἔκκοπον, St. Luke xiii. 7; here we have two errors in rendering. The immediate force of the Aorist here as well as of the compound verb is "cut it at once (the barren tree) out" (of the ground which it only cumbers), instead of the utterly inadequate "cut it down." Again, the beauty and the emphatic force of St. John x. 14, ὁ ποιμὴν ὁ καλός, is marred in the inadequate rendering, "the Good Shepherd," instead of "the shepherd, the Good Shepherd," as distinguished from all others.

So in Shakespeare one finds a similar form of giving emphasis to a word—"There comes a frost, a killing frost," "We few, we happy few."

Last, the basis of the present version is Professor Nestle's Resultant Greek Text. Excellent as it is in some points, it is scarcely as satisfactory as the text of Westcott and Hort, and the Resultant Text of Dr. Weymouth, the latter of which is recommended by so many of the Revisers, and by other eminent Greek Scholars, as well as in the pages of the ACADEMY and of other critical journals. Although Bishop Moule gives a qualified commendation to the Greek text here adapted, he rejects several of its most important readings, as for instance in Romans v. 1, ἔχουμεν in favour of ἔχομεν, supported as he is by Meyer and Godet, and what is more by the context, as he states in his Cambridge Edition of the Epistle to the Romans, and in his valuable letters on the subject in the Revisionist. The most necessary desideratum with a view to an ideal translation of the Greek Testament is a critical examination by the most eminent scholars of Christendom at home and abroad, of the most ancient MSS. by the light of ancient versions and quotations from the Fathers. Otherwise, without such a textual basis any translation must be merely provisional, and may turn out as unfortunate as the work of him, who built his house, not on the rock, but on the sand, which fell, when the storm beat upon it.

SPAIN

Letters from Catalonia. By ROWLAND THIRLMERE. (Hutchinson, 2 vols. 24s. net.)

Two Argonauts in Spain. By JEROME HART. (Longmans, new edition, 5s. net.)

"My province is truthfully and impartially to set down the result of my observations," says Mr. Thirlmere in one of his letters. There is a strain of modesty in this assertion which might be misleading were it not for the fact that we are afforded ample opportunity for drawing our own conclusions respecting his province before we find him defining its limits. These conclusions make us realise that his statement is in truth a bold way of asserting that his book is intended to be something more than the narrative of a delightful holiday, for to infer a capacity for observation and the ability to express the same is simply to lay claim to the essential qualifications of the artist. These letters fully justify Mr. Thirlmere's delicate way of paying himself a compliment; with Spain as his subject and the pen as his medium he has proved himself an inspired exponent of the "great gospel of colour." It matters not whether he is describing a bull fight or a sunset, a sacred spectacle or a secular ceremony, a bold landscape or a little patch of flowers; in each of his pen-pictures, whatever may be its theme, he visualises a scene glowing with rich hues and subtle tone-shades. "The tortoise-shell butterfly," "the pickaninny moon," "the flames of peach, almond, apricot, and melocoton" mingling in "a divine fire of pink and rose," "the tiny bay, which shone like a sapphire" in the sunshine and "rippled with the resplendent hues of a peacock's tail" in the waning light, are but a few of the tints from the colour-box by which our author makes an appeal to the emotions, and in them lies the secret of his charm. Philosophy, history, revolution, politics, dogma, many quotations and numerous illustrations, all have a place in Mr. Thirlmere's Spain, but as to their respective merits and demerits there is certain to be difference of opinion: for his word-pictures, in which he expresses with vivid colours the poetry and music of Nature, he may be sure of a sympathetic public.

Mr. Jerome Hart frankly declares in a prefatory note that the illustrations to his book are not art, and that the text is not literature. Nevertheless, he has managed to get so into touch with Spain and the Spaniards, that although he covers much ground in one short volume never for one moment do we feel that we are globe-trotting when in his company. This new edition of "Two Argonauts in Spain" will be as much appreciated in England as by the author's many friends on the other side of the Atlantic.

ETON

THE long grey-misted chapel in the sun,
The towered silence of dove-haunted space,
The gloom of the old bell with its measured pace
Hurrying at last into a gentle run,
The playing-fields, where gossamers were spun
Of golden happiness, Time's mellowing grace
Touches but cannot change; only each face
Vanishes down the stream when boyhood's done.

But I change with the ever changing hours
And vandal Life my little world destroys,
Bidding me raise new walls and loftier towers;
Yet have I dear and comfortable joys
To hearten me, unfading Eton flowers,
The sunshine memory of laughing boys.

C. R. S.

RENAISSANCE GENTLEMEN

O NOT for that they ought
They fought when they fought,
But they fought for the splendour of the fight!
And they wedded while they wooed
Ere the fury of their mood
Went out in the blackness of the night.

O boldly led they then
The life of living men
In their glory, their bravery and pride!
They were cruel and strong
On the right side and the wrong,
And gallantly, gallantly they died.

ANODOS.

THE FIRST MEETING OF WORDSWORTH AND COLERIDGE

It seems strange that doubt should exist as to the exact date and place of the first meeting of these poets, whether it occurred at Racedown, or at Bristol; and if the latter, where, and when, in that city it took place. Much has been surmised, and a good deal written on the subject: but neither point has as yet been determined with accuracy.

In "The Life of Samuel Taylor Coleridge" by James Gillman (vol. i. p. 74), the writer says:

"Some years since the late Charles Mathews, the comedian (or rather, as Coleridge used to observe, 'the comic poet acting his own poems'), showed me an autograph letter from Mr. Wordsworth to Mathews' brother, who was at that time educating for the bar, and with whom he corresponded. In this letter he made the following observation, 'To-morrow I am going to Bristol to see those two extraordinary young men, Southey and Coleridge.'"

Gillman does not give the date of this letter, and his story contains several inaccuracies; for he goes on to say "Mr. Wordsworth was then residing at Allfoxden," whereas he was the tenant of Racedown when he first met Coleridge, and for nearly two years afterwards. If the letter of Wordsworth to his friend Mathews was extant and accessible, the difficulty could be cleared up at once; but all that we can gather from this extract is the fact that he went into Bristol from Racedown, on a particular day to see both Southey and Coleridge, presumably to see them together, and that these two "extraordinary young men" were already acquainted. Coleridge's own statements on the subject are ambiguous, and in later years his memory failed him; so that it is impossible to say whether in what he then wrote he refers to a first interview, or to the beginning of intimacy and friendship.

Fortunately we have two more explicit witness-bearers, viz., Mrs. Wordsworth and Sara Coleridge. (1) On November 7, 1845, Mrs. Wordsworth wrote to Sara Coleridge, the daughter of S. T. C., as follows:

"With my husband's tender love to you, he bids me say—in reply to a question you have put to him through Miss Fenwick—that he has not as distinct a remembrance as he could wish of the time when he first saw your father and your uncle Southey; but the impression upon his mind is that he first saw them both, and your mother and aunt Edith at the same time, in a lodging in Bristol. This must have been about the year 1795. Your father, he says, came afterwards to see us at Racedown, where I was then living with my sister. We have both a distinct remembrance of his arrival. He did not keep to the high road, but lept over a gate, and bounded down a pathless field by which he cut off an angle. We both retain the liveliest possible image of his appearance at that moment."

(2) Mrs. H. N. Coleridge—the same daughter Sara—in the biographical supplement to the "Biographia Literaria," 1847, vol. ii. pp. 345-6, writes:

"The whole spring and summer of this year" (1795), "he" (i.e., her father) "devoted to public lectures at Bristol, making in the intervals several excursions in Somersetshire, one memorial of which remains in the 'Lines composed while climbing Brockley Comb' (May 1795). It was in one of these excursions that Mr. Coleridge and Mr. Wordsworth first met, at the house of Mr. Pinny."

This statement would doubtless be made on the authority of her mother, Mrs. S. T. Coleridge. Now we know, from Dorothy Wordsworth's letter to Mrs. Marshall of September 2, 1795, that she and her brother were with the Pinny's at Bristol about the end of August 1795, previous to their receiving the loan of the farm-house at Racedown. Coleridge's "Lines written at Clevedon" are dated August 20, 1795. He was married in October 1795; and, if Wordsworth came in from Racedown to Bristol to see him and Southey (as he tells us he did), and if Mrs. Wordsworth was correct in reporting her husband's recollection of meeting the two young Bristol poets, and the two Miss Frickers whom they married, at the same time in the same house; and if, in addition, Sara Coleridge is correct in her report that her father and Coleridge first met in Mr. Pinny's house, it is almost proved that the meeting took place, not during a country excursion out of Bristol (as her daughter Sara suggests) but in the city itself, and in the early autumn—August or September—of the year 1795.

I have only recently found out where Mr. Pinny's house in Bristol was, and is; for it is still standing. It is a large commodious eighteenth-century mansion, No. 7 Great George Street, Brandon Hill, Clifton. Now Wordsworth could not possibly have invented a meeting with Coleridge and Southey and the two Miss Frickers in the lodgings which the poets occupied in 25 College Street. And as we know that it took place in the autumn of 1795, before Coleridge's wedding in October, we are almost shut up to the conclusion that the meeting took place in Mr. Pinny's house in Great George Street. I have obtained the following information, gathered from the title-deeds of the present owner of the property. In the year 1788 John Pinny built 7 Great George Street on part of the land known as Boar's Head Ground and Bullock Park. In 1817 John Pinny gave the house to Charles Pinny. By a marriage settlement, March 6, 1831, Charles Pinny settled the house on his wife; and in 1861 Charles Pinny and his trustees sold it to the present owners. It is a substantial house, solidly built.

There it was, in the house immediately opposite the steps leading up to the southern entrance to St. George's Church on Brandon Hill, that the three men—Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey—first met; and thereafter, Wordsworth paid a return call at the lodging of Coleridge and Southey in College Street. Another item of evidence may be gathered from S. T. C.'s poem "Lines written at Shurten Bars near Bridgewater," which was dated "September 1795, in answer to a letter from Bristol." It is evidently addressed to his fiancée, Sarah Fricker; and it contains the first printed reference to Wordsworth which Coleridge made. He mentions the glowworm, moving with "green radiance" through the grass, and in a footnote tells us that the phrase is "borrowed from Mr. Wordsworth, a poet whose versification is occasionally harsh, and his diction too frequently obscure; but whom I deem unrivalled among the writers of the present day in manly sentiment, novel imagery, and vivid colouring." The only poems at that time published by Wordsworth were "An Evening Walk" and "Descriptive Sketches." Little could Coleridge then forecast their joint literary workmanship in the "Lyrical Ballads." But the above note was probably written in 1795, when the "Lines" were composed, and it was certainly published in April 1796. The house in College Street, where Coleridge and Southey lived together, was then numbered 48. It is now No. 54, is built of stone, has a single shop window and door, but no shop on the ground floor, and has two windows on each side of the upper stories and of the attic. It is in a street of some eighty modest well-built eighteenth-century houses, most of them of brick, but some of ashlar free-stone, all three stories high. No. 54 is now marked by a tablet with the inscription "Samuel Taylor Coleridge, Poet, lived here, 1794."

It may be of use to mention the places in which he lived during these eventful years, with the approximate dates. In the autumn of 1794, at the close of a pedestrian tour in Wales, he came into Bristol, and walked thence with Southey into Somersetshire, to see their common friend Burnett at his father's house, and discuss the recently formed scheme of Pantisocracy, and emigration to America. On August 18 he met Thomas Poole at Nether Stowey; and, returning to Southey's mother's house at Bath, met and became engaged to Sarah Fricker; to whose sister, Edith, Southey was engaged. He stayed thereafter at Bristol for several weeks, writing and lecturing; then went to Cambridge, which he left for London in December. Early in January 1795 Southey went up to London, and brought him back to 48 College Street, Bristol, where he (Southey) lodged with Burnett; and there Coleridge remained with Southey, sharing rooms with his two friends, writing and lecturing till summer. They then separated, Southey returning to Bath, and Coleridge going alone into rooms at 25 College Street, a house which no longer exists. In September he went down to Nether Stowey to visit Poole. Returning to Bristol he was married to Sarah Fricker in the church of St. Mary Redcliffe on October 4, 1795, and at once settled in a cottage at Clevedon. This he soon found too far from the Bristol library, and removed to rooms on Redcliffe Hill. He went to Nether Stowey, to visit Thomas Poole, in February 1796; and returned to Bristol, to a house at Kingsdown; removed to reside in Nether Stowey Cottage on December 31, 1796, (Mrs. Coleridge called it "a miserable cottage," and S. T. C. "the old hovel,") where they stayed till 1800. It had two small dark parlours, one on each side of the entrance door, three or four bedrooms above, and a small kitchen behind. A narrow pathway communicated with Poole's garden. There was no quiet possible, and there were almost always visitors. Poole's library was near, and the "jasmine arbour" close at hand. Yet here Coleridge's finest poetic work was done; and hither came the Wordsworths, Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, Thelwell, and others.

During the same springtime of their genius, Wordsworth was at Racedown, arriving with his sister in October 1795, where he began "The Borderers," and the "Ruined Cottage." In 1796—when S. T. C. published his "Poems," and Southey his "Joan of Arc,"—Wordsworth finished his tragedy, and began to write lyrics. Coleridge went out to see him at Racedown on June 16, 1796, again on the 28th, and on July 2; returning on that day to Stowey with the Wordsworths, who remained there a fortnight, before they settled at Alfoxden.

It should be mentioned that both the Racedown farmhouse and the Nether Stowey cottage are still very much as they were at the close of the eighteenth century: Racedown entirely so, with the exception of a porch; and Stowey with the addition of an ugly projecting wing on the right-hand side of the old cottage. Racedown still belongs to the Pinny family, and the tenant is glad to show the house and grounds to visitors. The Rev. William Greswell, of Dodington Rectory, Bridgewater, has done much for the Stowey cottage, and charges himself with its upkeep; but it is greatly to be desired that the room in which "The Ancient Mariner," and "Christabel," "Kubla Khan," "Frost at Midnight," "Fears in Solitude," and many another lovely lyric were written, should become the property of the nation, as Dove Cottage at Grasmere is. Or, if local effort can start a public library for the village, some generous donor—who is a lover of the poets as well as a friend of the people—might surely be found to purchase the cottage and its garden, take down the ugly "annex," and build a room behind to hold the books, the librarian and caretaker living in the historic ones.

I may add that much light is cast on these days, places, and persons, by the "Letters of the Wordsworth Family," now in the press, which will be issued by Messrs. Ginn and Co., Boston, U.S.A.

WILLIAM KNIGHT.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

RICHARD LOVELACE

LOVELACE is associated in the mind of the average reader with two poems. He was the author of that famous song "To Althea from prison," and of that almost equally famous song "To Lucasta; going to the Warres." Incidentally these verses embalm the celebrated phrases:

"Stone Walls doe not a Prison make, Nor I'ron bars a Cage."

and

"I could not love thee (Deare) so much, Lov'd I not Honour more."

These sentiments enshrine Lovelace in the public esteem; but it may be doubted if he is otherwise known. The handsome, dashing captain who bearded the Parliament with a loyal petition and was committed to the Tower, the ragged spendthrift who died prematurely at forty "in a very mean lodging in Gunpowder Alley," are not sufficiently or justly remembered. Lovelace's very name has an air of gallantry, and it is ill to recall how, according to Aubrey's version, "obiit in a cellar in Long Acre." The soldier, who was also a poet, took a wound before Dunkirk, was reported dead, and returned to find his ladylove married to another. This Lucy, who was inconstant to his memory, he idealised; she became "lux casta;" and his poems, indited from a second prison at thirty, are inscribed "Lucasta."

It is said that Lovelace is inferior in respect of melody to Herrick, of wit to Suckling, and of fancy to others of his age. Mr. Carew Hazlitt has pronounced Withers to be superior, and declared "Shall I wasting in despair" to be a finer poem than "To Althea." But to tell the truth, it is an ungrateful task to compare these Caroline lyrists. There was an outburst of pretty song. If not so definitely as in the glorious Elizabethan days, England was still a nest of singing birds. And Lovelace fitted into his place becomingly. He had not Herrick's coarseness; he lacked also Herrick's exuberant fancy. But he had more depth in him than his contemporaries; he presented moresides. Not only Catullus was his master. Curious echoes unexpectedly ring in his verses. Would Herrick have been able to write that handsome and sustained pastoral, "Amarantha," with its vague Miltonic stirrings?

"Far hence all Iberian smells,
Hot Amulets, Pomander spells,
Fragrant Gales, cool Ay'r, the fresh,
And naturall Odour of her Flesh,
Proclaim her sweet from th' Wombe as Morne.
Those colour'd things were made not borne,
Which fixt within their narrow straits,
Do looke like their own counterfeits.
So like the Provance Rose she walkt, Flowerd with Blush, with Verdure stalkt."

Is there not something of "L'Allegro" in this? There is a tenderness underlying his sprightliest pieces which we miss in Suckling or Herrick. Recall the song to "Lucasta weeping."

"Lucasta wept, and still the bright
Inamour'd God of Day,
With his soft Handkercher of Light
Kist the wet Pearles away."

It is artificial, it is on a conventional model; it is keyed to a sentimental standard. But it has a softness and simplicity which attract us. It must be remembered, moreover, that the fashion of that day had "standardised" the treatment of certain sentiments and emotions. You approached your mistress in a conventional manner, as had the trouvères some centuries before. Yet what mistress would not be approached in such lines as these?

"Like to the Sent'nel Stars, I watch all Night;
For still the grand round of your Light,
And glorious Breast
Awake's in me an East:
Nor will my rolling Eyes ere know a West."

He is as playful as you will, but that was exacted of him. He deals with Lucasta's gloves, her muff, her patches, in all frivolous seriousness. He begs Amarantha, "sweet and faire, Ah brade no more that shining haire." There is where you may take him on Herrick's ground, if you will, and contrast the two. Herrick desires more musically "a sweet disorder in the dresse." Lovelace asks that his lady should "dishevell her haire." But Herrick could never have done better than:

"Doe not then winde up that light
In Ribands, and o're-cloud in Night,
Like the Sun in's early ray;
But shake your head and scatter day.
See 'tis broke! . . ."

It is prettily done, and is a pleasant conceit. And Herrick could not have written:

"From the dire Monument of thy black roome,
Wher now that vestal flame thou dost intombe,
As in the inmost Cell of all Earths Wombe.

Sacred Lucasta like the pow'rfull ray
Of Heavenly Truth passe this Cimmerian way,
Whilst all the Standards of your beames display.

Arise and climbe our whitest highest Hill;
There your sad thoughts with joy and wonder fill,
And see Seas calme as Earth, Earth as your Will . . ."

Lovelace was capable of dignified flights; he had a certain odic quality of verse, which passed into his lyrics. Saving for a little uncouthness of melody, to which he was subject, the first verse of this song is perfect.

"In mine own Monument I lye,
And in my Self am buried;
Sure the quick Lightning of her Eye
Melted my Soul ith' Scabberd dead;
And now like some pale ghost I walk,
And with anothers Spirit talk.

Nor can her beams a heat convey
That may my frozen bosome warm,
Unless her Smiles have pow'r, as they
That a cross charm can countercharm;
But this is such a pleasing pain,
I'm loth to be alive again."

The fact is that Lovelace had really a serious mind. He was earnest in his politics, in his soldiering, in his affections; and he was compelled to write light amative verse. Nowhere do you find him breaking out into the wantonness of his contemporaries. That explains the fine note which characterises both the poems to Lucasta on going to the wars, and to Althea, which has rendered them immortal. I do not suggest for a moment that Lovelace's temperament was puritanical. On the contrary, he had the wine of life in all his arteries. But he scarcely approached life with the outlook of most of his contemporaries. One of his most striking and original poems shows this divergence. It has almost a modern note; and might suggest to some minds in a fanciful moment the sentimental cynicism of Thackeray's verse. It is one of the two poems, designated "A Loose Saraband":

"Nay, prethee, Dear, draw nigher,
Yet closer, nigher yet;
Here is a double Fire,
A dry one and a wet:
True lasting Heavenly Fuel
Puts out the Vestal jewel,
When once we twining marry
Mad Love with wilde Canary.

Off with that crowned Venice
'Till all the House doth flame,
Wee'l quench it straight in Rhenish,
Or what we must not name:
Milk lightning still asswageth,
So when our fury rageth,
As th' only means to cross it,
Wee'l drown it in Love's posset.

Now tell me, thou fair Cripple,
That dumb canst scarcely see
Th' almightinesse of Tipple,
And th' ods 'twixt thee and thee:
What of Elizium's missing?
Still Drinking and still Kissing;
Adoring plump October;
Lord! what is Man and Sober?"

Of course Thackeray would not have expressed such sentiments, but Byron would, and Henley has. It is a melancholy thought that Lovelace should have died so untimely and in such straits. Some of his best numbers were included in the posthumous volume which his brother published to his memory. Lovelace was a good brother, and appears to have been a lovable man. I think he is a better poet than is generally supposed; and had he lived he might have been better still.

FICTION

The Dark Lantern: a Story with a Prologue. By ELIZABETH ROBINS. (C. E. RAIMOND.) (Heinemann, 6s.)

It is difficult to believe that Miss Robins can have found much pleasure in writing this story, or that, with her knowledge of men, women, and the world, she should have expected any considerable reward of praise from its publication. She may, perhaps, have thought it a duty, for the better information of the sex to which she does not belong, and for the encouragement of frankness in that to which she does, to strip all disguise from the love-passion in women and reveal its workings unobscured by centuries of romance. But though she may have found very good arguments for doing so, they can only have confirmed a sense of obligation to mankind without bringing pleasure to herself. It may have been a useful but it was not an agreeable task that she set herself; especially since, to do the work well and put it beyond cavil, she chose for the purpose of her demonstrations as high-minded and right-minded a girl as we are ever likely to meet, delicately sensitive yet firm, and entirely devoid of the weakness of foolishness. It is the chief purpose of the prologue, evidently, to bring out these characteristics; and it is done with complete success in what is on other accounts the pleasantest part of the book. Then begins the more purposeful part, in which there is but one thread of story, and, except for the re-appearance now and then of some personages from the prologue, only one genuine human being. This is the girl who is to show us unveiled the influence and operation of love in the case of a woman more than ordinarily steady, sensible, well disposed and well-bred, when thrown into the society of a Real Man. The real but at the same time ideal man is now brought in: a very remarkable person, but mostly remarkable because he is an ideal real man to the mind of a woman so observing and discriminating, so well informed and well endowed, as Miss Robins. Otherwise he would be no novelty, for we have had many intimations from inferior novelists that the man most capable of inspiring and securing the adoration of woman is he who is most of a brute. Now we think we may say confidently that in all the range of fiction there has been no brute so coarse, no brute so consistently, invariably, and wholly brutal as Dr. Vincent, the subjugator of Katharine Dereham. At first and for a considerable time their relations are those of physician and patient, though Vincent had known something of Miss Dereham and conceived a dark passion for her in her earlier girlhood; and it is while she is under his hands as doctor that he convinces her by the rudeness of his manner, the inflexible tyranny of his sick-room regulations, and the violence of his language and demeanour when the least of them are questioned (it is impossible that they should be disobeyed) that there is no other man on earth for her but he. He will damn her to her face for the smallest offence, and usually does so with a look to correspond. It will be believed, perhaps, if we cite the page which records the fact (page 190) that he even charges her with "behaving like a damned balky horse"—not a proper thing to say to the lady, but how sweet to the woman! Yet this is very far indeed from being the most convincing proof that he is a Man. Here, however, we dare not quote, for much that may be told in a novel cannot be repeated in a review. Miss Dereham does not quite like this particular outrage, but she accepts it; and so we pass on to matters more surprising yet. To what benefit and for whose pleasure can such a tale be told? As a study for the enlightenment of men it can yield no gratification to that sex, but the contrary in proportion as each reader considers it credible. And how many women are there who can read such revelations by one of their own sex gratefully, or with contentment that what may be sometimes true should be presented as an authoritative analysis of the love of woman?

Tragedy and Trifle. By MRS. W. P. BROWNE. (Brimley Johnson and Ince, 6s.)

WE can heartily recommend this book to those honest souls who like their fiction plain and straightforward. They cannot fail to be interested in learning how Miss Margery Stewart (while her cousin, Harold Percival, with whom she had an understanding, was away in South Africa trying to make his fortune) was hurried into a marriage with the middle-aged vicar, the Rev. Edward Hastings, whom she "almost disliked," on the plea that it would save the life of her father, who was dangerously ill. Besides, Mr. Hastings is well off, while Mr. Stewart's affairs are in confusion. After the marriage, Mr. Hastings' extremely unpleasant character is revealed; he is narrow-minded, proud, jealous of Percival, whom he knows well he has not really supplanted, a humbug, intensely worldly, and incapable of loving a creature except himself. Mrs. Browne must have been unlucky in the vicars she has known. All comes right in the end, the final "tragedy" being effected by the aid of a serviceable apparition. This spectre, after receiving with complete imperturbability a succession of three missiles, a water-bottle, a brass candlestick, and a revolver shot, mournfully shakes his head, and says slowly: "You—have—wronged—my—most—unhappy—child." "Chee-ild" is an obvious emendation. This Visitor from the Unseen—we lay no claim to the capitals—also, that same night, came to the aid of his chee-ild, who was with difficulty dragging herself along through a drenching storm. It is only fair to add that the book is written with sincerity and a certain vigour; its radical fault is its hopeless conventionality. It is dedicated to Canon Ainger, the late Master of the Temple.

Sandy. By ALICE HEGAN RICE. (Hodder and Stoughton, 5s.)

IF we remember rightly, the entertaining Mrs. Wiggs was presented to us in a series of detached sketches, and so was her successor, Lovey Mary. In "Sandy," Mrs. Hegan Rice has aimed at writing a consecutive story and has not altogether succeeded. The scenes are scrappy and unfinished, and the general impression is of unreality. At the same time it is impossible to be severe on Sandy himself. We do not believe that a boy who plays in a football match when he ought to be in an examination-room is likely to "get on in the world" under ordinary circumstances; but we can believe that Sandy's charm and spirit were stronger than any circumstances, even those of his early youth, and that wherever he went he made friends. We like him best when he is most down on his luck, for then, like his kinsman, Mark Tapley, he comes out strong. He arrives in a great American city with a dollar in his pocket, and the only room he can afford is hot and suffocating. "It's like a boilin' potato I feel," he said; "and the pot's so little and the lid so tight!" By sheer good humour and courage he turns the little miseries of life into little comedies, and in her picture of this lovable temperament the author is true to life. She gives him the defects of his qualities too and shows him impulsive, happy-go-lucky and spendthrift of his chances. His ultimate worldly prosperity is, we feel, the accident of a fairy tale and not the outcome of his own deeds. But he is as pleasant as sunshine: we like his company and we like some of his friends. There is a delightful old negro woman who finds him half-dead in the road when he is a little starving tramp, remains his friend through good and evil fortune and finally "gets religion" with inconvenient publicity at his wedding. The Judge and his wife, the doctor and his daughter, are all figures of some freshness and charm; and they are in harmony with their background, a little country town in Kentucky. There is an amusing ballroom scene with an etiquette quite different from our own; and there are many glimpses of a life remote from the great streams of traffic and of struggle. The determined optimism of "Sandy" is even less convincing than the optimism of Mrs. Wiggs, but in spite of this his adventures make a pleasing book.

Marian Sax. By E. MARIA ALBANESI. (Hurst and Blackett, 6s.)

ALTHOUGH Madame Albanesi's new novel is readable and even interesting, it is not altogether up to the mark expected of her. It is a story of love and villainy, unfortunate love and successful villainy: but more particularly it is a story of coincidences so numerous and daring that it excites amused wonder as to how far the author will go in her demands upon the reader's credulity. The plot turns upon the personation of a dead woman in a claim for a fortune, and the chief villain is of the most uncompromising wickedness with never a momentary turn towards repentance or remorse. And, after all, the author allows him to escape the dock by the production of a will whereby he is entitled to all the money in question. This is too bad, and deprives the reader of the time-honoured right to see poetic justice meted out to the evil-doer. To keep the balance even, there is a sternly moral hero, a north-country squir of ancient family, who becomes gardener to Sir Charles Durham in execution of a scheme for paying off his brother's debts. It does not seem convincing, but no doubt might explain that he understood his own affairs. Eva Durham, the heroine, is an amiable, everyday young woman; she is not beautiful, but we are assured more than once that she looked bonnie and winsome in a red tam-o'-shanter and a tartan-plaid shawl. But then Eva's taste is distinctly crude in many matters. Probability is not a strong point in "Marian Sax," and the characters are rarely to be met with outside the covers of a novel, but their strange views of love and life are worth reading about, and are often entertaining. Madame Albanesi writes easily and fluently, but quite without distinction. Her well-bred people use expressions which well-bred people avoid in real life, and her English is occasionally doubtful. Such a sentence as "I think I ought to be a match for a man like he," suggests, to put it gently, a certain amount of carelessness on somebody's part.

A Quixotic Woman. By ISOBEL FITZROY. (Murray, 6s.)

THIS is a fairly well written story about a number of unattractive people influenced by more or less base motives: greed, cowardice, craving for social success at any price are the leading characteristics. Here and there a scene is effectively arrived at, and arouses a certain amount of interest, and the characters are such as may be met with any day—and avoided. In an intricate plot an outrageously vulgar money-lender and a countess play the chief parts; the money-lender orders his son to marry the countess's daughter, and out of sheer terror of his father's temper the son obeys, although he has a wife and children already somewhere in the background. The countess's daughter, who has been brought up to understand what is expected of her, and from Society, submits to the marriage as a way of paying a debt. She proves, however, quite capable of looking after herself and her interests later on, and is an object of pity and sympathy to the author only. It is not an elevating picture of Society and it is painted entirely without relief—if there is a quixotic woman hiding anywhere the reader regrets that he never caught a glimpse of her. The book reads like a first venture into the field of fiction; the author shows distinct ability, and should write a better story than this next time, but we hope her choice will fall upon pleasanter people and incidents. After all, there are pleasant people and incidents in life; and it is better to begin by writing about them, because it is harder to write about them well. However, in that way sympathy is learned, and there is no good fiction without sympathy. Only the sympathetic should venture to be critical, and the sternest censor loves his fellows the most.

FINE ART

THE CHANTREY FUND—THE J. S. FORBES COLLECTION AT THE GRAFTON GALLERY

THE purchases this year made by the Council of the Academy from the Chantrey Fund, whilst appearing in the nature of a concession to universal criticism, justify Mr. Mac Coll's contention that no body of professional artists can exercise the breadth of judgment with the absence of bias we should expect from a trained gallery director.

The Council has tried to disarm criticism in one case by purchase of a work by a deceased artist, the Return from the Ride by the late Charles Furse, and in another of a work from the New Gallery, the Alcantara, Toledo, by Mr. Harold Speed.

Both these purchases merely emphasise, as might be expected, the point of view that the Academic art of the present day is the only art worth considering. Charles Furse died an Associate, and it is a mere chance that Mr. Speed's clever little picture hangs in the New Gallery and not in the Royal Academy, where his portrait of his Majesty, hung in the place of honour, gives us le revers de la médaille with a finality which unfortunately Royal portraits seem doomed to afford.

The Council need not have troubled to desert its home merely to find a picture so commonplace that it might have been ensured a place on its own walls.

There is an excellent article in the Art Journal for May, giving a list of artists who should on any catholic basis be included in the National Collection, together with reproductions of some of their works. Opinions may differ on the precise merit of the particular works selected for reproduction, but there is no doubt that the artists would be approved by any responsible director of generous taste. But when we read the list and find among them Matthew Maris, Wilson Steer, Charles Shannon, Whistler, William Nicholson, David Peppercorn, Will Rothenstein, we realise the impassable nature of the gulf. Mr. MacColl proved and the Royal Commission by its finding acknowledged, that apart from matters of taste, the Chantrey Fund had not been impartially administered. But in the main the purchases have shown the criterion of taste and would hardly have been any better even with the strictest attention to the terms of the bequest. We cannot expect the Council to purchase for a permanent National Collection works that in all probability it would consider inadequate for temporary exhibition on the walls of the Academy. It prefers a nocturne by Mr. Harold Speed to a nocturne by Whistler, which shows the hopeless nature of the case. Mr. MacColl may bring the Academic horse to the water (of Chelsea), but the old Rosinante shudders and rears and refuses to drink.

It is significant that the picture selected by the Council from the Royal Society of Painters in Water-colours, is one of the very few that bid defiance to tradition in that last home of the pure art of water-colour. Mr. Alexander's Peacock and Python is a very able work, but it has no resemblance to water-colour. It is painted in gouache on brown paper, and has the tightness and hardness that must result from such a method in finished work. Tradition in the use of any medium is evidently the last consideration in the eyes of the Council; otherwise Mr. Thorne-Waite's excellent landscapes in the manner of De Wint, or better still, Mr. Clarence Whaite's grand view of Snowdon, whose only fault is its excessive size, would have had a preference.

We have been reminded by the Exhibition now at the Grafton, that if there are gaps in the representation of British Art, there are yawning chasms in our National Collections which purport to represent all schools and periods. Until the opening of the Wallace Collection there was not a single example of the Barbizon school, and even there we have only one Rousseau, excellent of its kind, and one Corot which is a very slipshod affair. The proper home for the masters Corot, Daubigny, Millet, Rousseau, Troyon, Diaz, Monticelli is the National Gallery, and until room is found there for good examples of their work, it remains incomplete. Beside these might be justly included the best of the modern Dutch, Jacob and Matthew Maris, Bosboom and Israels.

The late James Staats Forbes, whose taste was not by any means impeccable, succeeded in the midst of his arduous business duties in making a collection, chiefly of these masters, which takes a very high place indeed. He showed his wisdom especially in preferring the smaller works of Corot, Daubigny and Troyon to their more ambitious attempts. Corot's magical gift is best shown in dainty gems, like the Pathway in the Forest of Fontainebleau. The larger scale of the Macbeth in the Wallace is not suited to his genius, which was lyric rather than epic. On the other hand, the larger scale was not so unsuited to Rousseau, whose solemn mood is seen at its best in the gorgeous Bird's-eye view of the valley of Bas Meudon. James Staats Forbes thoroughly understood Whistler's admonition that "the importance of a picture does not depend upon its size." One of the most perfect things in this fine collection is the tiny Off to School of that rare and exquisite artist Matthew Maris. Of course all these artists have been extensively "run" by dealers, but surely a capable director could be trusted to exercise his judgment. The Barbizon men were not always superior to the "pot-boiler," Diaz being the chief sinner. Both Corot and Diaz were sometimes great artists, and sometimes charming humbugs, and so for that matter was Whistler. Our distrust of ourselves and our dread of being humbugged unfortunately dispose us to fall victims to humbugs who have not even charm.

ART SALES

AT one time it was thought that the extensive vogue of English furniture of the eighteenth century would affect the prices of the Louis XIV., XV., and XVI. productions which had held their own in the market-places of the connoisseurs for so many generations. That this change has not come about, but that the price of English work, while growing greater, is still much on a level with the French was once more shown in the recent sale at Christie's, when some sixty-five lots, part of the property of the late Mr. Charles Neck, of Bracknell, realised £8939 3s. 6d.

The largest price was paid for a Louis XVI. commode, veneered with tulip-wood and inlaid with parqueterie, and mounted with ormolu after that well-known style which has never staled in the collector's mind, although the whole school has occasionally come under the ban of the professor of æsthetics. The commode brought 680 gs., and a Régence bureau 210 gs., while a, to us, more interesting writing-table of Louis XVI., with sides enriched with inlays of old French black and gold lacquer, in the then popular Chinese taste, fell to Mr. Wertheimer for 205 gs. A parqueterie secrétaire in the style of Martin Carlin, and others somewhat similar, a pair of marqueterie encoignures, thought to be the work of David de Luneville, with some suites of furniture and a few cabinets—à la Boulle—and so forth, rounded out a thoroughly characteristic collection of typical eighteenth-century pieces. Judged by the prices, the furniture of princes, rich in coloured woods, bejewelled with lac and ivory, but often poor in form and by no means perfect in workmanship, still holds its own, and, indeed, when all the ages and all nations have been searched for the most agreeable furniture for the Salon, the French of the three great periods is found to possess a gaiety and grace that no other work can equal.

THE DRAMA

"BUSINESS IS BUSINESS" AT HIS MAJESTY'S THEATRE

ONE of the characteristics of the modern French drama is its actuality. It is seldom far from life. It seldom strays into those regions of the traditionally theatrical which seem to attract irresistibly even the best of our modern English playwrights. It is strange that in a nation which loves oratory and has preserved, long after we ourselves have lost it, what a leading critic has aptly called the "forensic drama," so much realism, in the best sense of the word, should be a characteristic of the stage. Whether the playwright be the gayest of the gay, like Monsieur Alfred Capus, or a very serious person like that "intolerable pedant," Monsieur Brieux, he is always on the spot. His people are real people, not theatrical puppets; his subject is a subject that is in the minds of men outside the theatre as well as in it. He is, in fact, a man of the world, not a man of tradition or of dreams. Take the case of Monsieur Octave Mirbeau's Les Affaires Sont Les Affaires, which Mr. Tree is playing under the title of Business is Business. In the original French it is a close comment on the questions that are agitating the minds of Monsieur Mirbeau's countrymen at this moment. The financier and his influence on the means and morals of society offer as acute a problem in France as they do in England and America. His relation to the old nobility offers an even acuter problem than here; and the question of clericalism, which is agitating the whole of France, is one that scarcely touches us. Now on all these questions Les Affaires Sont Les Affaires provides, if not advice or a solution, at any rate a certain amount of illumination. It lets light and air into them, "tosses" them, in Bacon's irresistible phrase. You have your financier, your man of vast wealth, undeveloped moral sense, no education and no manners; you have your high-bred, distinguished, poverty-stricken aristocrat who is drawn inevitably into the toils of the money-maker and forced to sell his honour for the price of his debts. They stand one against the other, clearly conceived, sharply drawn individual men; but not individual men alone. They represent types, classes; and each becomes, in a long and very French scene in the third act, the mouthpiece of his class and ideal. The author, in fact, has used his brains, he has studied the life around him and reproduced it in his play. Not content with the emotions of individual men, he has concerned himself with the principles of social life, and the thought he employed must necessarily induce thought, discussion and clarification in the minds of his auditors.

In England we see things from a different point of view. We are far more interested in persons than in principles, in emotions than in thoughts. Which is the better attitude of mind for a playwright and his audience, we are not going to discuss here. Without insularity, we may record our opinion that a great deal of the praise which we hear of the French stage at the expense of our own is unfair and ungrounded. The fact remains that our range is more limited. Our playwrights stop short of principle, and confine themselves to persons. Business is Business is a striking example of this fact. It is only natural that the clericalism should be left out; it simply does not concern us at present. But the relations between the old nobility and the new plutocracy, the whole problem of the influence of the plutocrat, all but disappear when the play is turned into English. We have no forensic drama; we do not like the discussion of principle in the theatre, and Mr. Grundy, experienced old hand as he is at adaptation from the French, has eliminated what we do not care for in order to emphasise what we do. It is the emotion, the feeling, the personal character of Isidore Izard that have attracted him, and when, as we are promised, Monsieur Féraudy comes this summer to play Les Affaires Sont Les Affaires at the St. James' Theatre, it will be found a very different thing from Business is Business at His Majesty's. For one thing, Isidore Izard is a different person from Isidore Lechat. Since it is the personal feeling and character of Izard that are to be exploited, clearly he must have more of what is known as "the sympathy" than Lechat, who is to interest us also intellectually. He becomes far less of the cat than his French prototype is. He is more genial, more humorous, and shows his claws far less: and at the end of the play, when his only daughter has dashed his hopes of a great alliance with the old nobility by revealing her secret marriage with a pauper man of intellect in Izard's employ, and his only son has been killed in a motor-accident, it is with admiration, as of a great man in his own misguided way, rather than with the fear and horror inspired by a malignant and unconquerable power, that we see him rouse himself from the prostration of overwhelming grief to complete the ruin of two petty financial thieves who had dared to try and rob him. In the same way, his daughter stands in Mr. Grundy's version more or less for sweet and trusting girlhood, than for the young woman of decided opinions (which happened to run counter to her father's), an incomplete sense of moral duty, and some of her father's determination, who becomes the mistress of his poor assistant, not his wife, for the purpose of striking a heavier blow at her father's hopes and plans. We might pursue the contrast further through the play, did space permit.

How far Mr. Grundy's efforts to substitute the English point of view for the French will succeed in gaining popularity and a long run is a question about which it is safer not to prophesy. A leading obstacle to box-office success is the fact that, hard as he has tried, he has not succeeded in making any of these people pleasant. We cannot like Izard; we cannot like his stupid, timorous, cheeseparing wife, his dissipated, swaggering son, nor even his "revolting" daughter, who, in the person of Miss Viola Tree, is the exact opposite of the cant phrase we have used to describe the character. What acting can do acting has done. In all Mr. Tree's long gallery of strange, flamboyant impersonations, there has been nothing stranger and more impressive than his Isidore Izard. Mr. Grundy, wisely we think, has made the character a Jew, and Mr. Tree has built up, out of his own fertile invention and reminiscences of several Jew financiers with whom the world has been well acquainted, a Jew financier to the life. His vulgarity, his insolence, his ostentation, his conceit, his passionate love of his son, are all portrayed with a world of ingenuity and power, and Mr. Tree's make-up, we need hardly say, is wonderful. No one else had much chance, but we might mention Mr. Basil Gill as the pauper husband of Izard's daughter, Mr. George Trollope as Izard's son, and Mr. Robb Harwood as a German professor, one of the petty thieves, as particularly good in a strong cast.

SCIENCE

THE PRESSURE OF LIGHT

NEWTON taught that light—or rather its objective basis—consists of the propagation of minute corpuscles which travel at immense speed in straight lines, and entering the eye impinge upon and stimulate the retina. In thus advocating the corpuscular theory of light, Newton retarded the progress of optics for many decades after his death—a conspicuous instance of the malign influence of authority.

Now, if light consisted of a corpuscular bombardment, it would exercise, however faintly, a pressure upon all material objects that it encountered, a pressure not in principle distinct from that of one hand upon another. And it has long been believed that light does exercise such a pressure: but experimental evidence for this belief has been lacking. In one respect this has been fortunate; for the citation of experimental proof of light-pressure would certainly have retarded the acceptance of the undulatory or wave-motion theory of light, as against its older antagonist.

Now when Clerk-Maxwell correlated light with other forms of radiation, such as radiant heat and electricity, and established the electro-magnetic theory of light, which is now universally accepted, he showed that, even on this theory, light must exercise a pressure: and he deduced from abstract considerations a formula expressive of the measure of this pressure.

Many years ago Sir William Crookes followed those who had attempted to demonstrate what we shall henceforth know as radiation-pressure. His radiometer is familiar to all—a series of delicately balanced vanes, bright on one side, blackened on the other, which lie in a partial vacuum in a glass bulb. Exposure to sunlight or even the end of a lighted cigar causes these vanes to revolve. But it was shown that this effect is not due to light-pressure, but to the unequal heating and consequently unequal atomic movement of the remaining air in the bulb, due to the varying absorptions of the bright and blackened surfaces of the vanes.

Some four years ago, however, radiation-pressure was positively demonstrated, independently, by the great Russian physicist, Lebedew, and by two American observers, one of whom, Professor E. F. Nichols, showed us his original apparatus at the Royal Institution on Friday, May 12. Lebedew's method was based on the advice of Maxwell, which was simply to obtain as high a vacuum as possible, so as to exclude the action of heated gases, as in the radiometer, and thus to detect any action due to the pressure of light alone. Professor Nichols and his co-worker proceeded on different lines. They employed no vacuum, but were nevertheless able to exclude the gaseous action, which takes some time to manifest itself, whereas the effects of light-pressure are naturally instantaneous. I make no attempt here to describe that which the inventor found apparatus and diagrams necessary to explain. Let us merely observe that the fact of radiation-pressure has been established, that its amount has been measured, and that the measurements coincide, within the limits of estimated error, with the results reached by Maxwell employing the a priori or deductive method. The question is as to the general significance of this most signal discovery.

Of course, it explains that which it has long been invoked to explain—the development of tails by comets approaching the sun. It explains not only the formation of these tails, but their increasing width as they leave the cometary nucleus, the cases in which they are multiple—as in Donati's comet—and the manner in which they push their trains in front of them as they leave the Royal presence. But this does not represent a tithe or indeed an appreciable part of the cosmic significance of radiation-pressure.

It is, as every one knows, a mere terrestrial "accident" that we can see certain forms of radiation, feel others, and perceive others not at all. Thus the Hertizian waves, the infra-red rays, the rays of light, the ultra-violet rays, and many more are related as one note of sound to another. Wherever, then, there is a luminous body, or wherever there is a body which is possessed of any heat whatever, there is a source of radiation-pressure. Practically, then, we now have positive evidence of a universal force comparable to gravitation, its analogue and opposite: indeed, I see that Professor George Darwin is to read a paper before the Royal Society on Le Sage's theory of gravitation in relation to radiation-pressure. As gravitation attracts, radiation-pressure repels. In the case of large bodies, as the sun and the earth, radiation-pressure does not amount to one billionth part of gravitation; but in the case of the particles in a comet's tail we see that, despite the enormous mass of the sun, radiation-pressure far outweighs gravitation. In other conditions the two forces will balance one another. Now every body that is above the absolute zero of temperature exerts this force—and at all distances—its power decreasing with distance in the same ratio as does the power of gravitation. The unqualified assertion of Newton, then, that all bodies whatever attract one another with a force which is proportionate to their mass and varies inversely as the square of the distance is found to be only ideally true: for most, if not all, bodies also repel one another in accordance with an equally precise law. It is possible to combine the two into an algebraic expression without reference to which the law of gravitation should now no longer be stated.

Let us now briefly consider some of the consequences of radiation-pressure—of the fact that there is a mutual repulsion as well as a mutual attraction between bodies. In the first place, we must reconsider the view that all the matter in the universe will ultimately be agglomerated into one dense heap in virtue of gravitation. Further, we have another factor, besides the brake-action of solar and planetary tides, to consider as impugning the stability of the solar system. For observe that the first law of motion can no longer be held as unqualifiably true, even if the motion be through an untenanted and perfectly frictionless ether. It is said that, in such conditions, a body in motion must so move, in a straight line, and at the same velocity, eternally, if no force be impressed upon it. That, doubtless, is ideally true: but when are the conditions realised? For any body that emits radiant energy—e.g., any body such as the sun or the earth—contains within itself a cause of retardation. On its onward path, it leaves waves of radiation behind it and sends them in front of it. But in so doing it tends, as Professor Poynting has shown, to "crowd upon" the waves in front, whilst those behind it are "thinned out." In other words, the radiation-pressure will be greater in front than behind and therefore the speed of the body—and this applies alike to a Sirius or a bullet—will constantly be diminished. In considering the future of the Solar System, then, we have to recognise, in planetary radiation, and in the effects of the solar radiation, causes which tend to retard that motion in virtue of which alone the planets are prevented from falling into the sun. But it appears evident that such a catastrophe, even were it to occur in such fashion as not to induce the evolution of much heat, would by no means introduce a final state of the Solar System, as used to be thought.

Such are a few of the cosmic bearings of radiation-pressure; but ere we leave the subject one may be excused for speculating as to the way in which this discovery may modify or extend our knowledge of vision. The evolutionist believes that the original sense was a sort of touch, from which all the others were evolved—a view advocated alike by Democritus and Spencer, as readers of Tyndall's Belfast Address may remember. Now if all the senses are evolved from a pressure-sense, it is of interest to find that both of the two highest senses may now be related to their original form. Hearing is evidently a specialised pressure-sense, sound being a wave motion to and fro in the line of propagation. And now vision must be regarded, I think, as also a pressure-sense. In so saying, one does not forget the chemical changes which light induces in the retina; but the suggestion is that these changes, which we know to be induced by light, are really induced by its pressure. The chemical changes in the "visual purple," and so forth, though complex and visible, are analogous to similar changes which doubtless occur in the touch-corpuscles of a finger: and in each case the external stimulus is pressure.

Finally, let us note how close we are to the inconceivable. You could push one of Professor Nichols' recording vanes with a pin; or by a puff of the breath. In each case some material is moving against the vane. Similarly you can push or "strike" the vane with a beam of light. But in this case—though light travels at a known speed—nothing material—not even if we include the ether as material—moves onwards, as does the pin or the puff of air. Try to conceive how a thing may be struck and moved by that which has no material existence. Failing this, try to form a "clear and distinct idea" of the that in question.

MUSIC

WAGNER AND COLOUR

THE Graces float before our minds, interwreathed in a lovely trinity; the Nine Muses as a bunch of wild-flowers springing from one mountain-stem. Every art holds a sister art by the hand, it is said; hence the intimate relation of things to each other in Beauty's coronal of perfection. Perhaps no two are so nearly allied as Tone and Colour. The modern painter covers his canvas with harmonies and symphonies; the modern composer is polychrome. A great violinist of to-day rebukes his pupils for wailing in purple, when the more consoling strains of the Concerto or Aria under their hands are to his musical eyes celestial blue; the new impressionist school of sound in France deals, like Corot, in nebulous tints of pearl and grey, produced by weird progressions—all half-tones, or all whole tones. And we know the story of the blind man who, being asked to define what the word "scarlet" represented to his windowless mind, replied: "The sound of trumpets." Him would Wagner have embraced as a true seer.

Colour to Wagner was quite as vital as form; and the effort to turn dry bones of counterpoint into an organism animated with resplendent hues represents the life-struggle of this great genius. "And the face of the earth shall be renewed," it is written. It is the office of dominant personalities to stamp at will their own effigy on the century. The spirit of primitive man who, after race and contest, clubbed his bride and dragged her by the hair to his mountain eyrie, there to work at his bidding and found his race, survives in these "monsters of genius." And we recollect a phrase in Sabatier's admirable life of Saint Francis of Assisi, dealing with the supernatural fire and force of these epoch-making men who, taking a recalcitrant world to wife, make her the unwilling mother of their ideas. Of such was Wagner.

Wilhelm Richard Wagner, sixth son of a Leipzig official, first saw the light on May 22, 1813, at No. 88 Hause Brühle—the house of "The Red and White Lion." In the curious effect of flame produced on a sensitive mind by the juxtaposition of words in this pretty cognomen, fanciful people might hear the sound of trumpets heralding the advent of a prophet of colour indeed. Most biographers attest that his childhood gave no special promise. In his own autobiography however, we read that his dying stepfather, Richard Geyer, hearing him one day picking out tunes on the piano, said faintly to his wife, "Could he perhaps have some talent for music?" To this stepfather, who died in 1821, and of whom he spoke ever in terms of lively affection, Wagner probably owed his first intellectual stimulus. On the early morning following Geyer's death, the mother entered the room where all her children slept, and spoke some loving words to each. To the little Richard she said: "He hoped to make something of thee."

When one belongs to a family of six, all penniless, it is indeed imperative that something should be made of whatever vital stuff lies in the brain. It would be a curious study to discover how far necessity goes to shape our geniuses, most of whom spring from the lower or middle classes. Contrary to the poet Gray's opinion, evidence proves that "many a mute inglorious Milton lies," stifled in ceremonies of an over-lavish civilisation, rather than undeveloped in a pauper's grave. As a rule, luxury, not poverty, is intellect's deadliest foe. However, it was not altogether so with Wagner. Although at first, perhaps, his naturally self-indulgent, self-centred temperament might never have leapt into creative activity without the spur of poverty, later we find him justifying his intense love of luxury as the best means of producing in himself the necessary "art mood." He wrote to Liszt in 1854:

"I cannot live like a dog. I cannot sleep on straw and drink bad whiskey. I must be coaxed in one way or another if my mind is to accomplish the terribly difficult task of creating a non-existent world."

Beethoven has often been spoken of as possessing a sixth sense—presumably a sense of absolute music, so subtle, and so beautiful, that no one has ever been able perfectly to analyse it. Wagner himself was of opinion that, in Beethoven, music, as a pure art, had reached its highest perfection, and that new developments of the old forms could only lead to decadence. Therefore he resolved to create the musical world anew. Poetry, music, and painting—painting both of descriptive sound and elaborate scenery for his dramas—were to be welded into an indissoluble unity of art. This was his dream.

"Let me," he says, "dive into the fountain of music, and there shall be created sounds which will make the people hear, though they cannot see."

Later it was his ambition to make them see, though they would not hear. From his Swiss seclusion, a brief letter flew to Liszt, in December 1853. "I am spinning myself in like a silkworm" (his desire for complete isolation at such times almost amounted to mania). "But also from within myself am I spinning," he adds, a phrase which recalls some of Keats' famous utterances. Wrote the Bard:

"It appears to me that almost any man may, like the spider, spin from his own inwards, his own airy citadel. The points of leaves and twigs on which the spider begins her work are few, and she should fill the air with a beautiful circuiting. Man should be content with as few points to tip with the fine web of his soul, and wear a tapestry empyrean—full of symbols for his spiritual eye, of softness for his spiritual touch, of space for his wandering, of distinctness for his luxury—"

Poor proud Keats! Wagner's more concrete aims also required more than a "tapestry empyrean" and his love for colour in tone, extended itself to his actual surroundings. Catulle Mendès, who surprised him one morning by an early visit, describes him as attired in

"coat and trousers of golden satin, embroidered with pearl flowers; for he had a passionate love for luminous stuffs that spread themselves like sheets of flame, or fall in splendid folds. Velvets and silks abounded in his drawing-room and his study, in broad masses and flowing pleats, anywhere, without the pretext of furniture, without other reason than their beauty, to give the poet the enchantment of their glorious brilliancy."

"I am much better qualified to squander 60,000 frs. in six months than to earn it," he wrote to Liszt; and to Praeger: "By nature I am luxurious, prodigal and extravagant, much more than Sardanapalus and all the old Emperors put together." And, again, in a letter to Frau Wille:

"Is it really such an outrageous demand if I claim a right to the little bit of luxury which I like? I, who am preparing enjoyment for the world and for thousands! . . . I am differently organised from other men—must have beauty, splendour, light."

Must have! So he believed, and to this end begged and borrowed unceasingly, to the distress of stolid little Minna Wagner, his first wife, and the perplexity of his friends. His own genius was to him a sort of Moloch, to which everything must be sacrificed in turn—self-respect, fidelity, gratitude and friendship. Even the noble-hearted Franz Liszt was temporarily estranged from him at the time of his daughter Cosima von Bülow's divorce, and the subsequent change of religion which she undertook to make her marriage with Wagner possible. Wagner loved Liszt devotedly, and the thought of wounding this loyal and generous friend pained, but could not restrain him. He was, in fact, incapable of self-restraint. "Light—more light!" exclaimed Goethe in his dying hour. Wagner's robust demand, all his life, was for more colour everywhere. To do him justice, what he craved was not so much satisfaction for the man himself, as food, through the man, for the genius. This furnace, like Benvenuto Cellini's, had to be fed in its hour of need, with the furniture of his whole existence—also of other people's existences, if they happened to be handy. "Myself will to my darling be both law and impulse," says Nature of Wordsworth's Lucy, dreaming of the relation between her own dewy, budding creatures and the fresh human life in their midst. Furthermore, she promises that "vital feelings of delight shall rear her form to stately height." Wagner's nature was his own law and impulse, and the meanderings which he deemed necessary to the development of his mental stature became in consequence considerably less innocent than Lucy's. Keats tells us that we "by the wandering melody may trace which way the tender-legged linnet hops." Wandering melodies indeed! Think of such self-betraysals as Tannhäuser, as Tristan and Isolde: consider the lawlessness, poetical though it be, of Siegfried! The tenderness of which Keats sang fastened on Wagner's heart and head, rather than his legs, except in so far as these bore him away from Minna. Poor little long-suffering woman! She never understood her mighty husband, nor his innovations, which she detested. But all Wagner's biographers agree in extolling her sweetness, her patience, her admirable domestic qualities. She was, in fact, a duck of a woman, who spent twenty-five years of fruitless repining at his side because her eagle would not say quack, quack.

"How could she have expected," wrote Wagner to Frau Wille, "that I was to be shackled and fettered like any common fellow? My inspiration carried me into a sphere she could not follow. . . . She did not feel that I am a man who cannot live with wings tied down. What did she know of the divine right of passion? which I announced in the Flame Death of the Valkyrie, who has fallen from the grace of the gods? With the Death-Sacrifice of Love, the Götterdämmerung (Dusk of the Gods) sets in!"

Possibly genius from its pinnacle of exaltation, gazing down on life's spreading plains, feels more strongly than another, what Stevenson in his "Prince Otto," speaking of a real mountain height and a real landscape, so beautifully calls "the invitation to the road."

The weaknesses of great natures are proverbial; they are also fathomless as chasms in an alp. Wagner is not an exception to the generality of such beings, even in our day; still less could he have been esteemed so at the time of which we write, when a great revolutionary wave had just passed over Europe, leaving both spiritual and temporal kingdoms rocking on their thrones. Germany had not by any means shaken off the influences of the Sturm und Drang period, when, says G. H. Lewes in his "Life of Goethe":

" . . . all worked in one rebellious current against established authority. . . . With the young, Nature seemed to be a compound of volcanoes and moonlight, her force explosion, her beauty sentiment. To be insurgent, sentimental, explosive and lachrymose were the true signs of genius. . . . It was indeed a strange epoch; many not respectable sentiments arrayed themselves in rose-pink. . . . The lovely Countess Branconi writes to Lavater, 'O toi chéri pour la vie—l'âme de mon âme!' and further rhapsodises about his mouchoir, &c. with a fervidness only surpassed by a letter from another of Lavater's adorers. 'O! that I could rest on thy heart in the Sabbath-holy evening stillness. O, thou angel!' This sort of thing went on all round. They wept and were wept on."

Plenty of colour this for people who like it! Flame—colour, in fact, and laid on thick. Goethe, returning from Italy, imbued with joyous paganism, looked on the faded charms of his old love, Frau von Stein, with much the same distaste as Wagner experienced later for the old classical forms of music, and turned for relief in colour to the rosy cheeks and bright eyes of Cornelia Vulpius. Liszt, striding from conquest to conquest, finds the boudoir of his Countess Potocka strewn literally ankle-deep with rose-leaves to receive him.

We are not told if this wading in luscious sweetness was agreeable to Wagner's friend. Wagner himself could never have had too many rose-leaves.

"Splendour, beauty, light, all the components of colour, these he claimed as the rights of genius; of these in his life he has woven, in art," says Finck, "the rich Clang-tints which distinguish his music from all other."

CORRESPONDENCE

TWO OLD SONGS OF MAY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is difficult to render the third line of the eighth quatrain in the first Gaelic poem in my article of last week: "Rich harvest of mast falls." Dr. Kuno Meyer gives it "soft rich mast buds." I do not know of any Gaelic word for "mast" (i.e., acorn-food, beechnut food, cone-food). I recollect (though I have to quote both original and translation from memory) a couplet in an old ballad called the Laidh Chlann Uisne:

"Loch-Eite nan sian bu chian o'n iul,

and Mr. Carmichael giving the second line as (in effect):

And Connel of the fresh-green mastled woods;

but here crannachaille is "branchy-woods"—"mast-bearing" or "mast-producing" woods, by inference—and the word has nothing to do with "mast," acorn or nut food. Probably the line should be translated "bloom" or "seeding" of oak or beech. The fourth line is also obscure. I give Dr. Kuno Meyer's literal rendering:

"Light swallows dart aloft, Loud melody) reaches round the hill,
The soft rich) mast buds,
The stuttering quagmire rehearses.

SCIENCE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—My previous letters were written with a definite object which they have amply fulfilled, and were intended to open out a wider and more important question on which I should like to enlarge, if you can grant me the space.

No one, I suppose, will deny that the growing predominance of science in the intellectual world is one of the most remarkable and startling facts of the last hundred years. How great the debt is which we owe to science, and to the pioneers and leaders of scientific inquiry, every thoughtful man will most gratefully acknowledge without hesitation or reservation. But it would be idle to pretend that this reign of science has not been attended by a serious drawback. Leaders in the world of science seem to imagine that, because they are supreme authorities in their own domain, they can claim equal authority in every other domain; and they legislate on all questions, spiritual, moral, literary, and social, with an arrogant self-confidence which would be pitiable, if it were not laughable. I need not refer to Comte, with his calendar of famous men and his selected library of 150 works. But look at the two eminent Englishmen, Darwin and Spencer. When Darwin discourses on the "Origin of Species," I sit at his feet with humble reverence as a docile learner. But when he lays down the law on subjects which lie outside the range of science, when he asserts that the dog has a sense of religion just like man, or dogmatizes on the origin of language, my emotions are very different. When Spencer explains the "direction of motion" or the "rhythm of motion," I am lost in admiration, and eagerly eat of the crumbs which fall from his scientific table. But when he babbles of "the current theology" (what a scientific phrase!) of which his knowledge is less than skin deep, or summarily rules men like Thucydides, Tacitus, and Saint-Simon out of the field of education, sublimely unconscious that the works of those great writers contain a deeper insight into human nature, and a profounder and more comprehensive knowledge of the springs and motives of human character and human action than the works of all the men of science put together, I am moved to adopt the celebrated French epigram addressed to Beaumarchais, "Ce n'est pas tout d'être scientifique, il faut encore être modeste."

And observe how history repeats itself. In the Middle Ages theology put forward the extravagant claim to be "Queen of the Sciences," and the Church ordered Galileo to treat astronomy in a "theological spirit." In modern times science has usurped the dictatorship which theology once exercised, and bids us study theological questions in a "scientific spirit." It is difficult to say which claim is the most absurd. Imagine the President of the Royal Academy urging his milkman to treat lacteal questions in an "artistic spirit," or the Poet Laureate urging students of medicine to treat physiological questions in a "poetical spirit"! I should have imagined that in this enlightened twentieth century the proverb about "the shoemaker and his last" might have been safely suffered to drop into oblivion; but experience seems to show that it was never more urgently needed than now, especially by those teachers of science of whom it may be said, in well-known words, that "their forte is science and their foible is omniscience," and who seem to be persistently exclaiming, like Shakespeare's wit:

"I am Sir Oracle,
And when I ope my lips, let no dog bark!"

I trust that you will pardon the great length of this letter in consideration of the importance of the subject. I have had it in my mind for months past.

THE SCARAB

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—A leading contributor, writing hereon at page 526, remarks as follows: "It would be meaningless to assert that there is an ethical element in knowledge, say of beetles, as such." What, then, about the scarabæus sacer, or sacred beetle of ancient Egypt, worshipped "as such," and utilised as amulets?

Vulgarly, the scarab is a dungbeetle, and has the art of rolling up mud pellets for its egg deposit; but, as to the "ethical element"! Well, they would not have become sanctified without a reason, and their native name is that of "keeper," and they were sacred to the dead; grammatically, keeper, as Anglicised, means existence, creating, and the word is found in composition dynastically, for "Kheper-Ka-ra" was Usertesen I, of the twelfth dynasty. Finally, the humble scarab still survives with us as the cock-chafer, or May-bug, German Käfer, Egyptian "Keeper."

BOOK SALES

Messrs. Sotheby, Wilkinson and Hodge sold on the 11th and two following days a large and interesting collection of autograph letters and historical documents comprising specimens of the writing of Burns, Lord Nelson, Edmund Burke, Thackeray, Marie Antoinette, Napoleon, Disraeli and Dr. Johnson.

The principal items were as follows:

- Anne of Austria, Queen of France, wife of Louis XIII., signature on a warrant. £2 4s. (Maggs).
- Chatterton. Autograph MS. "The Gallery and School of Nature." £4 5s. (Sabin).
- Newton, Sir Isaac. Signature on Exchequer tally. £1 13s.
- Letter of Piron (the French poet). £2 12s. (Maggs).
- Letter written by St. Vincent de Paul. Extremely rare. £6 15s. (Pearson).
- Letter from Mary Wollstonecraft to Miss Hays. £1 18s. (Pearson).
- A series of autograph letters from Mrs. Siddons to Mrs. Pennington, an old friend, principally relating to the troubles between her daughter and Mr. (afterwards Sir Thomas) Lawrence. £100 (Knapp).
- Twenty-five letters of Mrs. Piozzi. £16 (Sabin).
- Letter from Robert Burns to John Syme, stamp office. £25 (Thompson).
- Another letter of Burns, dated 1795. £14 10s. (Maggs).
- Signature of the "Young Pretender" on a warrant, 1745. £15 10s.
- Letter from Lord Nelson to Capt. Keats, 1804. £8 (Sotheman).
- Waterloo and the Peninsular War, 24 letters written by Sir Thomas Noel Hill. £5 10s. (Sabin).
- Letter from Lord Nelson to Lady Hamilton. £10 10s. (Sabin).
- Letter from Sir Walter Scott to John Cundell (on golf). £7 (Cundell).
- Letter by Sir Edward Burne-Jones. £5 5s.
- Robert Louis Stevenson. Signature on "Charity Bazaar" paper. £3 15s. (Spencer).
- Disraeli on his speech on National Education. £2 (Pearson).
- Keats. Sonnet in his autograph. £5 (Spencer).
- Edmund Burke to Charles Barron declining election for Bristol. £5 5s. (Russell).
- Letter from Lord Nelson to Lady Hamilton, May 4, 1805. £71.
- Lady Hamilton to Lady Nelson. £11 5s. (Maggs).
- Sir Joshua Reynolds. Autograph MS on "Method of Study." £20 10s. (Quaritch).
- General Benedict Arnold, "the Traitor," to the Earl of Shelburne. £21.
- Passport signed by Louis XVI. for David Hartly, British Minister. 1783. £11 (Trebault).
- Letter from Marie Antoinette to Necker. £40 (Quaritch).
- Original warrant signed by Lord Burghley for payment to Popham, Attorney-General, for his services in connection with the matter of Mary Queen of Scots. £33 (Pearson).

- Letter from Louis XIV. of France to Viscount Turenne. £7 5s.
 Lord Byron to Capt. Roberts. £4 (Barker).
 Autograph letter of Charles Lamb. £4 19s. (Maggs).
 Autograph letter of Congreve. £5 (Maggs).
 Letters of Caroline Bonaparte and others. £9 5s.
 Frederick the Great to Algarotti. £20 10s.
 David Garrick to George Colman. £5 (Stevens).
 Letter from Count Grammont. £7 5s. (Maggs).
 Letters from Guizot. £5 2s.
 Letter from Dr. Johnson written at Lichfield. £8 5s. (Pearson).
 Letter from Louis XVI. of France when eight years old. £15 10s. (Clarke).
 Letter from Murat, King of Naples, to his wife's mother (Madame Bonaparte). £6 1s.
 Letter from Napoleon I. to his mother. £27 10s. (Sabin).
 The same to his brother Lucien. £12 15s. (Sabin).
 Lord Nelson to Lady Hamilton, 1801. £41 (Wharton).
 Miniature of Lady Hamilton by Mrs. Cheney. £30 (Parsons).
 Letter from Rousseau to the Countess de Boufflers. £10 5s. (Jarrett).
 Sir Walter Scott. Autograph Manuscript "The Bonnetts of Bonnie Dundee." £85 (Isaacs).
 Voltaire. Autograph verses to Algarotti. £20 (Clarke).
 Letter from Lord Bolingbroke to Sir Thomas Hanmer. £6 (Barker).
 Letter from Edmund Burke to Sir Charles Bunbury. £8 5s. (Quaritch).
 Letter from same to Mrs. Bunbury. £8 (Harvey).
 Letter from Lord Byron to H. C. Fox. £7 10s. (Pearson).
 Crabbe the poet to Edmund Burke. £14 (Sabin).

THE BOOKSHELF

More Cricket Songs. By Norman Gale. (Alston Rivers, 2s. net.)—Mr. Norman Gale—was ever poet dowered with a more euphonious name?—has fairly won the right to be regarded as our laureate of the cricket field. Time was, when he tuned his lyre to a softer strain, singing of country pleasures "chaste but warm," in the immortal phrase of some fortunate reviewer. The country is still his love, but he sings no longer of dairy-maids; he is all for sterner joys, and his new book of verse might almost be entitled "The Compleat Sportsman"—so earnestly does he advocate strenuous endeavour in the "bronzing sun," so stoutly does he reprehend the vice of grumbling:

"To throw your hands above your head
And wring your mouth in piteous wise
Is not a plan," the Captain said,
'With which I sympathise.
And with your eyes to ape a duck
That's dying in a thunderstorm,
Because you deprecate your luck,
Is not the best of form.'"

With the spirit that prompts Mr. Gale to this utterance we are in cordial sympathy. If we are to have cricket songs, it is clear that his is a good pen for the purpose. His verse is easy and fluent, his sense of rhythm is well enough, his enthusiasm so real as to be almost infectious. Except when he attempts the pathetic touch, as for example in "The Old Professional," the reader can turn to any page in his little book with the pleasing certainty of finding mild amusement. Sometimes the humour is a trifle thin; sometimes the rhyme is forced; on occasion we may think the treatment something more serious than the subject warrants. But Mr. Gale is considerably above the average as a craftsman, and cricketers will no doubt welcome his volume. Whether he might not have employed his talents more profitably in another direction is a question that we need not discuss here.

The Wild Irishman. By T. W. H. Crosland. (T. Werner Laurie, 5s.) It is always a little difficult to take Mr. Crosland with quite the proper degree, not of seriousness, but of unseriousness, if we may coin a word for the occasion. We have a notion that he must have enjoyed many a naughty laugh in his sleeve at the heavy truculence of some of his critics. For one suspects that a good deal of the apparent acrimony with which he has assailed a certain canny nation and an uncertain, charming sex is as much a pretence with him as that little bundle of light lyrics with which he began his literary excursions was parodic. Still, there are limits to pretences and parodies, and if, like the little boy in "Allice," he only does them to annoy, because he knows they tease, the persistence and the manner of his caricatures reveal such malicious proclivities that one longs for just the right kind of "Duchess" to pop him neatly into a corner without worrying too much about the matter. In his new book anent the Irish he "is as cantankerous as ever with his" ancient enemies the Scotch, but even if his cherished ancient enmity is half make-believe, it passes all decorum to remark as he does, that no more than an Irishman can forego the potato can a Scotchman "forego oatmeal and offal." This is a fair specimen of many gross lapses compared with which the numerous bracketed ejaculations—the "tut-tuts" and "think-of-its," and "Glory-hes," with which he has annotated a lengthy quotation from a little book called The Scot in Ulster, are mere urbanities of style. Towards the Wild Irishman, however, Mr. Crosland elects to be conciliatory—conciliatory in his own fashion. Mr. Crosland is proud of his book. He "takes leave to point out" that it presents a new and a true view of Ireland. For ourselves we hardly think that the whole book amounts to a "view" at all at all. Mr. Crosland certainly has views on twenty subjects, ranging from wit, whiskey, and the shillelagh, to pigs, poetry, and potatoes; but what do they all amount to? As far as we can see, that potatoes and pigs are a pity, and that the other things, with the exception of the whiskey (which, of course, is "better for your ethical and nobler parts than the Scotch variety") no longer exist in Ireland, or, if they do, are not really Irish. For instance, Mr. Crosland once saw a shillelagh (one of a possible thousand in the whole country) "which reminded one of nothing so much as a Salmon and Gluckstein silver-headed ebony walking-stick cut short." Again, he has heard of Irish humour, yet he quotes a long string of stories, only to find that they give him qualms as to their power of amusing the "twentieth-century person." And are they Irish after all? As to poetry, his sole consolation in the mediocrity of Tom Moore lies in his ability to congratulate the Irish people "that they should have produced and put their emotional and moral trust in a Moore, rather than a Burns," while his knowledge of Mr. Yeats, who has a chapter to himself, has convinced him that his qualities are not in any way Celtic. "The best Kelt we ever had was Mr. Yeats' own master, one William Blake, who was sheer Cockney. Mr. Yeats is just Blake spun out and over conscious." And Mr. Crosland proceeds to quote little tags from each to prove that we can't tell one from t'other. Well, well! We must not be lured into controversy lest the interest clinging to some of the chapter headings should seem to give the book an importance which it hardly deserves.

Stories of King Arthur, retold from Malory by W. Waldo Cutler (G. G. Harrap). King Arthur and his Round Table never grow stale. In the twentieth century they are still gilded with eternal romance. In this modern guise, somewhat curtailed to suit a hurrying century, they will gladden youthful readers who joy to read "chronicles of wasted time in praise of ladies dead and lovely knights." These legends of sturt and strife, of masterful warriors, are told in an easy and picturesque style. As we know, the deeds of derring-do are intermingled with fine instances of humanity and kindness, courtesy to women and knightly faith. Their simplicity, their directness and truthfulness make these tales always good reading for young and old. King Arthur's name and fame are localised all over Britain, quite apart from Wales, Cornwall, Winchester, &c. We have references to Northumberland, and in proof thereof Merlin's Grave is on Tweedside; Arthur's Seat at Edinburgh, Camelot; and the site of the vanished Roman building called Arthur's Oven carefully described by George Buchanan and others near Falkirk; and tales of the Round Table connected with Stirling Castle. Arthur, created in the twelfth or thirteenth century, had undoubtedly some notable patriot British chief as his original. These were the centuries when knighthood, knightliness was a craze. This volume is well illustrated and has an excellent introduction.

These Stories of Robin Hood, retold from the old ballads by J. W. McSpadden, form a kindred volume from the same publisher. Robin Hood was a more prosaic King Arthur, a rustic hero and true Saxon goaded into wild ways by Norman oppression. The editor has made good use of the old ballads, "ballads gallant and gay," on which his characters are based, and mingles verse and prose happily. It were well that English childhood were nurtured on such wholesome diet. It is the red deer, the venison from the greenwood, compared with the milk-and-water pabulum too often presented to-day "as suitable for the young." When their nutriment does not err on the side indicated then there is everywhere the trashy magazine, the highly flavoured "dreadful."

There is something almost superfluous about Mrs. G. King Lewis' little book, Critical Times in Turkey, and England's Responsibility (Hodder and Stoughton, 3s. 6d.), since the publication of Miss Durham's recent work. Mrs. Lewis also went out to Turkey to carry clothes and provisions to the victims of the late disturbances, and though she went to a different part of the country—to Bourgas, and afterwards to Drama and the country near the Bulgarian frontier—the duties she undertook were exactly similar. But Mrs. Lewis lacks Miss Durham's experience of the people and her well-balanced manner of looking at things. The chronic misery of many of the inhabitants of European Turkey, whether they are Greeks who have been harried by the Bulgarians, or Bulgarians who have been raided by Mahomedans, or Mahomedans who have been ruined by one or other of the other nationalities, is heart-rending in the extreme. But it is the natural and inevitable result of jarring creeds and nationalities without a strong and just hand to keep them in order. Mrs. Lewis' book does more credit to her heart than to her head. If her exhortations were followed literally the result would be a European conflagration, of which no man can see the end, and which would bring about far more suffering and slaughter than it could possibly suppress. The Near Eastern Question is not such plain sailing as some onlookers imagine, and the trained diplomatists who have it in hand are treading on ground beneath which are fires scarcely hidden and with difficulty kept under. They know the danger and do their best to avert it.

Richard Wagner to - Mathilde Wesendonck
Letters and Leaves from a Diary

With Portraits and Facsimiles. Translated by WILLIAM ASHTON ELLIS. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 16s. net.

The German original of this illuminating work has already reached its tenth edition in the course of a year—an experience quite phenomenal in Wagner literature.

"These letters are likely to create a sensation throughout the world. For the first time is one of the most remarkable chapters in Wagner's life
—the genesis and completion of his Tristan—laid bare in its inmost recesses. Without this glimpse the picture of Wagner's life is incomplete."

THE ROMANCE OF VICTOR HUGO AND

JULIETTE DROUET. By HENRY WELINGTON WACK. With an Introduction by FRANÇOIS COPPÉE. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, uncut edges, 6s. net.

"It is an interesting little story that Mr. Henry Wellington Wack has to tell of the romance of Victor Hugo and Juliette Drouet."—Daily Telegraph."Mr. Wack has shown discretion as editor and author, and his book is of absorbing interest as a real love-story."—Daily Chronicle."These letters are filled with the softest breathings of the tenderest passions. . . . The book will interest many beyond the wide circle of Hugo's admirers."—Scotsman."The letters are among the most interesting in the great catalogue of the love-letters of the famous. . . . A striking feature of the book is the collection of illustrations."—Vanity Fair.

TALKS in a LIBRARY WITH LAURENCE

HUTTON. By ISABEL MOORE. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, uncut edges, 10s. 6d. net.

This book tells in easy narrative form of the life and experiences of this prominent author, with special reference to the interesting men with whom he had been in intimate relation and of whom he had many interesting souvenirs.

FOR THE WHITE CHRIST: a Story of the Days of Charlemagne. By ROBERT AMES BENNETT. With Illustrations in Colour from Paintings by the KINNEYS. 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, 6s.

Altogether unlike any novel of recent years, its breadth, its dramatic intensity of action and largeness of scene, and imposing figures that constitute its leading characters, justify a comparison with the fine old romances of days gone by.

MAN'S RESPONSIBILITY; or, How and

Why the Almighty introduced Evil upon the Earth. By THOMAS G. CARSON. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. net.

"He (Mr. Carson) has at least written an able and suggestive book. He opens with a striking inquiry into the first principles of creation."—Sussex Daily News."It is a thoughtful and suggestive study of the first principles of moral science, based more closely upon psychological evidence than is commonly the case with such books."—Scotsman."There are many suggestive thoughts and many wise reflections in this volume."—Aberdeen Free Press."Mr. Carson 'sermonises' in a familiar vein."—Glasgow Evening News."Mr. Carson is certainly acute, and writes with lucidity. . . . The book is fluent and well arranged, and on many points suggestive."—Inverness Courier.

WANTED: A COOK. By ALAN DALE.

Crown 8vo, cloth extra, 6s.

A uproariously funny comedy novel of a self-conscious couple in contact with the servant question, the farce and satire of the æsthetic home-life-in-a-flat paradox, told in Mr. Dale's brightly entertaining manner, all centering about the ludicrous predicaments with "Cook." "There is a fund of humour and entertainment in 'Wanted, a Cook,' which makes it delightful."—Athenæum."The book bubbles over with humour."—Newcastle Chronicle."Wanted, a Cook," as the title of a novel, suggests a luxury of sympathetic woe which few women will resist, and which will also claim many a mere male reader."—Daily Telegraph.

FRENCH CLASSICS FOR ENGLISH

READERS. Edited by ADOLPHE COHN, LL.B., and CURTIS HIDDEN PAGE, Ph.D. Six Volumes, the Works of the following Authors, are in immediate preparation:

Rabelais, Montaigne, Molière (2 vols.), Beaumarchais, George Sand.

The design of the series is to present the chief French authors, in the best possible translation to English readers, to meet the need of many who are interested in French literature and desire to know it directly, but who cannot easily read its authors in the original, and to fill the lack of adequate and dignified representation of these authors in public and private libraries.

RABELAIS. Including all the best Chapters of his famous "Romance of Gargantua and Pantagruel" (the Seventeenth-Century Version of Urquhart and Motteux). 1 vol. 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, uncut edges, 7s. 6d. net. [Ready.]"The Editor has contributed an instructive introduction to the volume. The material equipment is in every respect satisfactory."—Glasgow Herald.

By MARY KING WADDINGTON.

With 24 Portraits, Views, &c., 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

Sir EDWARD MALET, P.C., G.C.M.G., writes in the OUT-LOOK: "Madame Waddington's present work is superior in charm to the previous one. . . . The letters are most agreeable reading because of the talent of observation which they display, and because they are written in good English and without affectation."

THE UPTON LETTERS

By T. B. Large post 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Just published.]

"In the 'Upton Letters' a schoolmaster gives his experiences of life to a friend in Madeira. Dated from 'The Upton'—which is neither Uppingham nor Repton—the correspondence tells of men and books, no less than of boys and lessons. The letters were returned to their writer when his friend died."

THE LITERARY WEEK

THAT Andrew Marvell is still a person of interest seems to be proved by the theft of his letters to the Mayor and Corporation of Hull. Among them is a fragment showing how the poet came under Jesuit influences at Cambridge. The scrap, addressed apparently to Mr. Marvell senior, speaks of "a fearful passage lately at Cambridge touching a son of mine" who had been induced to listen to "rotten and unsavoury Popish arguments to seduce him." Mr. Marvell senior eventually took alarm, and went after his son, who became and remained a Protestant stalwart.

Marvell, after being Milton's colleague as Latin Secretary to Cromwell, sat for Hull in Richard Cromwell's Parliament, and continued to represent the city until his death. His bitter tongue caused him to be so much feared by the Court that they sent Danby to try and conciliate him. The poet called the servant, and asked her what he had had for dinner yesterday. "A leg of mutton" was the reply. "And what shall I have to-day?" "The rest hashed," was the answer. "And to-morrow," he said, turning to his visitor, "I shall have the sweet blade bone boiled." Whereupon Danby retired, convinced that there was no means of corrupting one so habituated to the Simple Life.

Any Marvell documents which come into the market just now will be eagerly scanned, and gain, perhaps, a fictitious value. Two such are to be included in an interesting sale of books and documents at Messrs. Sotheby's on June 2, and both of the letters appear to have been addressed to those responsible for the sending to Westminster of the poet and his fellow member, Sir John Ramsden. The first letter was written on May 29, 1660, the day on which King Charles II. came into his own again :

"We have received yours of the 25 & would not misse answering you this same Post though it be THE DAY OF THE KING'S (CHARLES II) ARRIVALL. The Councell of State was broke up & acted no more before the receipt of yours. So that nothing at all could be done there-upon concerning Mr. Bloom & Mr. Hall. And truly Gentlemen, if we may presume to advise you, seeing it falls out so, be pleased to interpose yet while it is time your discretions for the composing of a businesse wch it will be difficult for us to handle so dextrously but that some reflexion may fall here upon your own judgements and upon the town. But we shall decline nothing nor thinke any thing better then that which you shall resolve on & if you please after some few days to write about it to his Majesties Privy Counsell, & for the approbation of Mr. Maior to be one of your number we will serve you therein. Onely we must beg of you that in whatsoever you shall use us you will acquaint us also with matter of fact distinctly & perfectly For else your businesse can not be well done."

The second letter is dated the following March, and touches upon the tobacco duty :

"... Yesterday his Majesty pass'd such bills as were ready: The principall of which were the Subsidy Bill: The Bill of Excise upon beere and Ale. One who describes himself as a beginner in composition has written to us asking for help. He says: "I desire to know something about 'Invention and Selection,'" and goes on to tell us that he is not able to take advantage of books because he cannot grasp their construction and the way in which the writer has built up the article, essay, or short story. It is like looking at a fine building; it requires an architect to show how the arrangement of the different parts give strength and grace to the whole. Questions like this are much more easy to ask than to answer. We suppose that as a matter of fact a book grows in the mind of its author very much according to the character of that author, and varies with the individual. One writer must have the whole story mapped out before he begins: another merely gets a start and lets the tale grow as it pleases. Balzac used to write out the the plot of his story on a piece of paper, re-writing it on a larger sheet, and repeating the process till the novel took its final shape.

Literary invention is only a preliminary to writing. Very often it is confused with imagination, but the two are quite different. The capacity for inventing a plot is not very uncommon and is a matter of mechanism pure and simple. We know of at least one man who has no literary ability whatever and yet is able to make a moderate livelihood out of the construction of plots which he sells to professional writers. The greater gift is that of imagination, which Carlyle defined as "bodying forth an idea." In creative literature, however, it is something more, and includes the gift of ability to live the life of the fictitious characters. It is after invention has done its work that imagination comes in, and with it knowledge and experience to make of the thing that has been imagined something truer than life itself.

Another word used by our correspondent is that of selection. Undoubtedly a good writer can always be recognised by his power of knowing what not to write. There is no author so wearisome as he who considers it a part of his duty to put down everything that comes into his head. He offers, in fact, an insult to his readers, implying that they have no understanding of their own and must be told everything like school children. But there is no surer sign of good authorship than the power of omitting exactly the right thing; command of language as well as synthesis of thought is necessary; for a writer who is really a master of language can make his very words suggest thoughts which a less skilful craftsman will fail to convey in whole paragraphs. But there are no rules of the game which we can offer our correspondent. It is a question of breadth of mind, literary sensibility, knowledge, and practice, and each of these must be present in the reader as well as in the author before the perfect expression of truth can be conveyed from one mind to another. All must be there, and all are equally important. The only advice we can offer is: Read and think; and avoid, above all things, educational handbooks that profess to tell you how literature can be made.

The latest literary problem is: Where was Elizabeth Barrett Browning born? The "Encyclopædia Britannica" says she was born in London; the "Dictionary of National Biography" assigns Burn Hall, Durham, as her birthplace. Some biographers have preferred Hope End, Herefordshire, while Mr. Ingram, in his Life of the poetess, says that the Tyne Mercury of March 14, 1809, announces for the 4th of March: "In London the wife of Edward M. Barrett, Esq., of a daughter." Mr. Browning, however, challenged this statement by asserting that his wife was born on March 6, at Carlton Hall, Durham, the residence of her father's brother. But Carlton Hall is in Yorkshire, and Mr. Ingram declares that it did not come into the possession of Mr. Moulton Barrett till after 1810. Finally, there is the entry in the parish register of Kelloe Church, which is as follows: "Elizabeth Barrett Moulton Barrett, daughter and first child of Edward Barrett Moulton Barrett, of Coxhoe Hall, native of St. James', Jamaica, by Mary, late Clarke, native of Newcastle-on-Tyne, March 6, 1806." Somebody certainly ought to offer a prize for the solution of so intricate a puzzle.

The news that the County Council had struck off its list of prize-books for day-schools the works of such writers as Lamb, Leigh Hunt, Thackeray, Whittier, Smiles, and even the blameless Mrs. Hemans, caused a flutter of excitement. People talked of the "Index Expurgatorius," and the "black list." But it turns out that it is, after all, the children themselves who are the censors. They are allowed to choose their own prizes, and they do not care for Mrs. Hemans, Elia, "The Four Georges," Smiles on Thrift, and the rest. And the County Council is wise enough to let them have what they do like.

When a book has appeared on the list for some time, and no child has selected it, it is clearly useless to keep it on any longer. There are other causes at work too, as a member of the Education Committee has explained. Books go out of print, or are too expensive, or belong to a soon exhausted number presented by some publisher who would rather give them away than "remainder" them. Or again, so enormous is the modern output of new books that they become superseded, perhaps, in a year from the date of publication.

In this respect we are inclined to envy those children. We were not allowed to choose. The present writer once received a handsomely bound book on Natural History (a subject which he always disliked) as a prize for good conduct; while his prize poem brought him seven massive volumes of the dullest history ever written. All Fielding might have been bought for half the money.

Count Tolstoy has joined the Genevan Rousseau Society. This is the text of his letter:—

"SIR,—It is with the greatest pleasure that I inscribe myself a member of your Society.

"I express my most sincere wishes for the success of your work.

"Rousseau has been my Master since I was fifteen.

"Rousseau and the Gospel have been the two great and beneficent influences that have affected my life.

"Rousseau does not grow old. Quite lately I re-read some of his works, and I felt the same elevation of soul and the same admiration that I experienced when reading him in the days of my youth.

"I thank you, therefore, for the honour which you do me in entering my name as a member of your Society, and I beg you to accept the assurance of my distinguished sentiments."

For Count Tolstoy the "Confessions" and the Gospels are works which differ not in kind but only in degree; and the difference, it would appear, is all in favour of the "Confessions."

Eighteen more Rousseau letters are about to be published. They have been preserved by a member of the family of Madame d'Houdetôt, and relate to the inflammable philosopher's passion for that lady. In one of them, sixteen or twenty pages long, Rousseau gives his views on the nature of friendship, and in another he discusses his feelings in regard to death which he believes to be impending. On the whole the documents supply evidence of mental anguish, and supplement and confirm what is written in the "Confessions" as to that period of Rousseau's Life.

At Montmorency, where the Houdetôt episode occurred, a statue to Rousseau's memory is about to be erected. His Hermitage there was given to him by Madame d'Epinay: and Grimm predicted that she would presently have reason to repent of the gift. "Solitude," he wrote, "will end by blackening his imagination; he will think all his friends unjust, ungrateful, and you first of all, if you refuse to do as he orders." This prophecy came true. Rousseau was wanted to accompany his benefactress to Geneva, where she wished to place herself under the famous physician Tronchin. He refused, and wrote to Grimm as follows:

"I have learned for two years in her house unremitting subjection, with the finest discourses on liberty; served by twenty servants, and cleaning my own shoes every morning; loaded with indignations, and sighing unceasingly for my wooden bowl. . . . Compare my benefits from Madame with my country sacrificed, and two years of slavery, and tell me whether it is she or I who is most obliged to the other."

The letter seems to justify Grimm's description of the Sage as "a moral dwarf on stilts." The practical consequence of it was that he had to leave the Hermitage, whence he adjourned to Montlouis. The amazing thing is that, after quarrelling with Madame d'Epinay, he actually wrote to her to say that his friends "had advised him not to leave until Spring." The lady returned the cutting answer:

"Since you are determined to quit the Hermitage, and are persuaded that you ought to do so, I am astonished your friends have prevailed upon you to stay there. For my part I never consult mine upon duty."

After that he had no alternative but to terminate his tenancy without further loss of time.

The question of the concentration of the teaching of the Preliminary and Intermediate subjects of the medical curriculum in London at a few centres, has long occupied the attention of those interested in medical education, as it has been felt that this step must result in greater efficiency in teaching, as well as economy in expenditure. The Westminster Hospital Medical School has been the first to take definite action in the matter, and has just completed negotiations with King's College, by which arrangements have been made for the teaching of Physics, Chemistry, Biology, Anatomy, Physiology and Materia Medica (that is to say, the subjects of the Preliminary and Intermediate Examinations) to Westminster students at King's College. Students will enter Westminster Hospital Medical School as in the past and will remain Westminster men, and will not become matriculated students of King's College; but they will be taught the earlier subjects of study at that institution. The scheme will come into effect at the commencement of next Winter Session in October. At the same time, the Westminster School is thoroughly reorganising the teaching of the subjects of the final examination. It is believed that this commencement of a probably more general concentration of the teaching of the Preliminary and Intermediate subjects of the curriculum cannot but promote the best interests of Medical education in London.

So many agreeable exhibitions have been given us by the hospitality of the Burlington Fine Arts Club that it seems almost discourteous to complain that the present collection of English embroidery—of periods up to the middle of the sixteenth century—is of narrow appeal and little æsthetic value. To the accomplished student of thirteenth-, fourteenth- and fifteenth-century work there is, no doubt, much of interest; to the artist and the craftsman there is food for thought, but no remarkable inspiration that is essentially English. During the thirteenth century there is no doubt that English work was sought for by continental bodies; France, Italy, and Spain still possess examples of ecclesiastical embroidery of this period. But after that much of the English work was complicated by foreign additions and assistance. The famous "Fishmonger's Pall," now in Savile Row, has even been suspected of other than native influences, and many of the embroideries in gold and silver thread and coloured silks for dalmatics, chasubles and copes are doubtless English only in their actual workmanship, not in feeling or design. To those who would learn something of the subject, a visit to Savile Row and a study of the excellent catalogue, with its clear and informing introduction by Mr. A. F. Kendrick, will be of no small value. The connoisseur and critic of the subject will find much on which to whet his wit and exercise his acumen.

The death has been announced of M. Alphonse Tavan, one of the founders of the Félibrige. The story of the institution of that famous Provençal society has been told by Mistral, now the sole survivor of the original band. This is his account of it, in his own words:

"The word 'felibre' was adopted from 1854 onwards by the promoters of the linguistic and literary renaissance of the South. On May 21, 1854, seven young poets, Theodore Aubanel, Jean Brunet, Anselme Mathieu, Frederic Mistral, Joseph Roumanille, Alphonse Tavan, and Paul Giera met at Font-Segune, near Chateauneuf de Gadagne (Vaucluse) to concert, at a dinner of friends, the revival of the Provençal literature. At dessert the bases of this palingenesis were agreed upon, and a name for the designation of the adepts was sought. It was found in a folk-song which Mistral had recovered at Maillane—a song still used as a prayer in certain families of the people."

The name félibre was hailed with approval by the seven banqueters.

Of all the félibres, however, only Mistral has achieved a wide renown. He, as all the world knows, has been awarded the Nobel prize; his works have been translated into English, German, and other languages; and his life has been written by an American scholar. Roumanille is known to a certain extent; but the next in fame to Mistral is a later adherent to the movement, Félix Gras, whose novel "The Reds of the Midi" had quite a success in an English version a few years ago.

M. Tavan was in the employment of a railway company. He was the author of two volumes of verse, "Amour et Plour" and "Vivo Vidanto," and of a comedy in five acts, entitled "Le masc," first played, during the Carnaval of 1854 in a coach-house at that Chateau-neuf-de-Gadagne which saw the beginnings of the movement.

On April 30 last a beautiful monument, the work of the sculptor Scherpe, was unveiled at Vienna to the dramatist Anzengruber.

The Senate of the town of Hamburg voted £1000 for popular performances of Schiller's plays from May 3 to 14. The price of the seats was threepence and fourpence. The Grand Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin gave a similar sum for a Schiller cycle in his Court Theatre. The Duke of Meiningen permitted three performances of Wilhelm Tell to be given gratis on behalf of all the schoolboys and schoolgirls of the dukedom.

Under the title of "Church Leaders, 1800-1900," Messrs. A. R. Mowbray and Co. Ltd., have had in preparation for some time past a series of monographs on the life and work of some of the most prominent English Churchmen of the Victorian era. One feature of the series, which is under the general editorship of Mr. G. W. E. Russell, is that it will be written by laymen, the object in view being in each case to bring out clearly and judge fairly the part played by each leader in the history of the Church during the past century. The first two volumes will be published early this summer, and are contributed by Mr. R. G. Wilberforce, who deals with Bishop Wilberforce, and by Mr. D. C. Lathbury, who writes on Dean Church.

LITERATURE

A PERSONAL IMAGE OF LONDON

The Soul of London. A Survey of a Modern City. By FORD MADOX HUEFFER. (Alston Rivers, 5s. net.)

MR. HUEFFER'S book is an original and thoughtful attempt to get at that elusive entity "the soul of London." And if he has to admit that the quest is hopeless, yet he moves to this negative through a multitude of interesting positives.

London is incapable of summary. You can form a mental picture of the outward and inward character of Manchester, of Glasgow, even of Paris. London defeats such efforts. It is true that we symbolise London pictorially by the dome of St. Paul's, but this majestic feature does not stand in any real fatherly or explanatory relation to the immense camp of men which we name as London. The Golden Cross only enables the eye to recognise as a town the vaguely horizoned cloud of houses below.

Mr. Hueffer starts from this point, and holds that one's mental picture of London town is in the end always a matter of approaches. This formlessness of London is equally felt in London's moral and social life; and Mr. Hueffer's purpose is rather to note the effect on the mind of this vaguely felt, always missed, totality, than to make any gymnastic attempt to state it. His language is that of indication, not of statement. Every one who has really pored over London's maps, especially district and large-scale maps, must have been impressed by the incalculable gulf which separates any conception of the town's size, derived from the map, from that obtained gradually in the streets themselves. Nor does the knowledge derived from collections of facts about London, in directories, blue-books, and what not, come to bear any more recognisable relation to the London of the eyes and the exploring mind. Yet only familiarity with these instruments can prepare the reader to share Mr. Hueffer's point of view, or, it may be, to follow without a certain fatigue, his endeavours to measure London by instruments of a psychological order. Thus it will depend a good deal on the reader's equipment whether he will really enter into Mr. Hueffer's thought that London is essentially a background; his thought that London is almost as truly a natural product "as any great stretch of alluvial soil"; and his thought that, in its essentials, London is "a home neither for the living nor the dead." Yet a town which defeats all material reckoning and all imaginative seeing cannot be discussed except in terms like these. As Mr. Hueffer says, to "get the atmosphere" of modern London is a task which requires the abandonment of all lingering or completed attentions. Even the Past must be treated as "a ground-bass beneath the higher notes of the Present." This phrase, alone, separates Mr. Hueffer's book from the whole mass of topographical-sentimental literature, much of it excellent in its way, which has grown up around London streets and districts.

Not only must the seeker for London's "atmosphere" be strong to discard his ready-to-hand topics, but he must have topographical charity. To use Mr. Hueffer's words:

"He ought to be alive to the glamour of old associations, of all the old associations in all their human aspects. But he ought to be equally inspired with satisfaction because work is being done; because dark spots are being cleared away; because new haunts are being formed for new people around whom will congregate new associations. And he ought to see that these new associations will in their turn grow old, tender, romantic, glamorous enough. He should, in fact, when he presumes to draw morals, be prepared to draw all the morals."

Having thus stated, as carefully as we can, Mr. Hueffer's point of view, we must add without delay that although he conceives his subject on this large scale, the stuff of his book is anything but vaporous and exclamatory. On the contrary, his illustrations in the way of sketch and description are abundant and charming. It may be just a description of London's fringe seen on entering it by rail. But what could be better in the way of synthetic vision than this?

"Small houses, like the ranks of an infinite number of regiments caught in the act of wheeling, march out into the country; in the mists of the distance they climb hills, and the serrated roofs look like the jagged outlines of pinewood, with, at the top, the thin spike of a church tower. The roofs come closer together; at last, in their regular furrows, they present the appearance of fields ploughed in slate, in tiles, in lead, with the deeper channels of the streets below. . . . And for me at least it is melancholy to think that hardly one of all these lives, of all these men, will leave any traces in the world. One sees, too, many little bits of uncompleted life. As the train pauses, one looks down into a main street—and all streets are hardly recognisable from a height. A 'bus is before the steps of a church, a ragged child turns a catherine-wheel in the road, and holds up her hand to the passengers. Suddenly a blue policeman steps into the roadway. The train moves on."

By such touches we are drawn into the "atmosphere" of a town which can be appreciated by nothing else, a town so forgetful of its past generations and so inconceivable by its present children, that Mr. Hueffer seeks relief in the phrase, "a home neither for the living nor the dead." Not less true, though less hyperbolic, is his "background" refrain, finely uttered in the following passage:

"A man may look down out of dim windows upon the slaty, black wet misery of a squalid street, upon a solitary flickering lamp that wavers a sooty light upon a solitary, hurrying passer's umbrella. He may have received a moment before the first embrace of a woman, or a moment before his doctor may have told him that he was not very long for this world. He will stand looking down; and a sudden consonance with his mood, of overwhelming and hardly comprehensible joy, of overwhelming and hardly fathomable pain, a sudden significance will be there in the black wet street, in the long wavering reflections on the gleaming paving-stones, in the engrossed hurry of the passer-by. It will become, intimately and rightly, the appropriate background for a beginning of, or for a farewell of life—for the glow of a commenced love or for the dull pain of a malady ending only in death. It is that, more than anything, that London has ready for every man."

It is something of a paradox that in attempting a book on London which requires the abandonment of detail, Mr. Hueffer is himself constantly thrown back on "bits" of its life. Only he chooses the "bits" whose interest does not end with themselves, or with some imperium in imperio, but which carry us further into the atmospheric whole. We all know how the mind recalls "bits" of London in very fatigue, and cherishes them in odd ways. Mr. Hueffer says:

"I have known a man, dying a long way from London, sigh queerly for a sight of the gush of smoke that, on a platform of the Underground, one may see, escaping in great woolly clots up a circular opening, by a grimy, rusted iron shield, into the dim upper light. He wanted to see it again as others have wished to see once more the Bay of Naples, the olive groves of Catania."

Similarly, Mr. Hueffer uses quaint and little-known details to indicate the secret variety of life in the monotonous street world of London. He knows a railway-signalman who, at night, in a cottage "down the line" seeks relief from levers and bells in making out of pith and coloured paper models of the English cathedrals, giving his small holidays to making trips to Bath, Durham, or Chester, and hoping to capture with his eyes the beauties of Notre-Dame and Amiens. Another man, known to our author, breeds pheasants in the enclosure of a City churchyard, and when they utter their shrill cry, says with rapture: "Doesn't it make you think of Norfolk?"

We think that the chief difficulty which besets the writer of such a book as this is his liability to fall into descriptions which are too light and subtle to be enjoyed—by most readers—in frequent doses. We mean descriptions so charged with mood that they almost ask for a direct human interest to support them. Take this—excellent in itself—about a well-earned idle gaze from a club-window:

"You live only with your eyes, and they lull you. So Time becomes manifest like a slow pulse, the world stands still; a four-wheeler takes as it were two years to crawl from one lamp-post to another, and the rustle of newspapers behind your back in the dark recesses of the room might be a tide chafing upon the pebbles."

And although we are in full sympathy with Mr. Hueffer's intentions, we cannot help thinking that he might with advantage have dealt more in definite names, places, and scenes. This would have mitigated a certain pressure and repetitive character in his style, especially in passages of cumulative description, where the eyes and mind would be grateful for vivid localities instead of phrases like "the narrow ways of the City" or "a broad highway of new shops."

THE CENTENARY LIFE OF MARTINEAU

James Martineau: Theologian and Teacher. A Study of his Life and Thought. By J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A. (Philip Green, 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS book, written at the invitation of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, appeals in the first instance to Dr. Martineau's own religious fellowship; but this domestic destination will probably be found rather to increase than to diminish its value in the eyes of the wider public, for it not only helps the reader to realise some significant and interesting currents in the social and religious life of the earlier nineteenth century, but also brings out into distinct relief the trend and quality of Martineau's own mind and character, as well as the immediate influences and pressures under which his thought and action were shaped.

The rich associations of his native city of Norwich seem to have left comparatively faint traces on him, and his recollections of his boyhood were neither numerous nor vivid. He was unhappy at school, being a sensitive and shrinking child, and enduring much tribulation from bullying, a circumstance on which a story he told in his old age may perhaps throw some light. A big and dull boy insisted one day on little Martineau doing his Latin exercise for him. He did it, but he inserted a mock translation of the sentence: "This piece of cloth is worth twenty asses." It began "Hoc pax panni" and ended "stolidos." The glee with which this piece of mischief was perpetrated survived the thrashing which it naturally entailed, and flashed up again from forgotten depths more than sixty years afterwards, when the two former school-fellows encountered each other once more, the elder as His Worship the Mayor of X, and the junior as the honoured guest at some civic function over which the Mayor presided. A streak of gleefulness always kept its place, though it was never prominent, in Dr. Martineau's character. In his venerable old age, when he was the recognised champion of the philosophy of Theism and his very presence breathed reverence and awe, it was good to hear him tell the story of the Scotch gilly who attempted in vain to dissuade him from following his own devices upon the mountain-side by assuring him that he would inevitably be lost in the mists, and adding the solemn warning: "And there you may shout your God-damns all night and nobody will hear you." When he was telling a story (and he had a goodly stock), his face would break into delicious laughter, but its settled expression was one of pensive yearning, a "looking up," in his own phrase, to the "inaccessible light." He himself dates his consciously continuous life from the time he spent (after leaving his Norwich school) with Dr. Lant Carpenter (the father of the physiologist and philosopher, and grandfather of the present biographer) in Bristol. In speaking of this teacher he says: "I have never seen in any human being the idea of duty, the feeling of right, held in such visible reverence." It was at this time his intention to be an engineer, but his true mission soon found him out, and he prepared himself for the ministry at Manchester College, York, under influences of a somewhat similar type to those of Dr. Carpenter.

This ethical strenuousness, to which his nature so readily responded, may well be held to give the key to his whole career as a thinker. Starting (a disciple of Priestley and Hartley) as a necessarian, with a discernible pantheistic tendency in his higher religious utterances, he worked himself completely away from both positions in obedience to the axiomatic demands of his ethical consciousness. No system in which the human will ceases to be a prime determining source, and is resolved either into a link in a chain of causes or into a manifestation of something behind itself, seemed to him to be compatible with moral experience. The strength of his philosophical manhood was devoted to combating sensational and materialistic conceptions, which represented the whole range of mental phenomena on the one hand as following a succession, rigidly determined by unvarying causation, from the first dawn of sensitiveness up to the highest æsthetic or religious experiences, or on the other hand as a mere by-product of a series of molecular changes each of which inevitably followed upon its antecedent. And when at the close of his life he had seen the philosophies he had resisted practically abandoned, he was still at war with prevailing tendencies, for the Hegelianisms or Absolute Idealisms which make man "without reservation a part of the universe," appeared to him to leave no more scope for the genuine initiative and the genuine responsibility of the human will, than the old sensational philosophies had done; and he opposed the most spiritual Pantheism as sturdily as he had opposed the most materialistic sensationalism. This implies that his theory of the conscience and his theory of the will were inseparably connected with each other, and that the whole scheme alike of his ethical and his religious philosophy was reared on the basis which they furnished. Even before he had shaken himself free from the early influences of Priestley and Hartley he had recognised in the human will the type of all force. In our own conscious effort and the resistance which it encounters we learn to know from the inside the nature of that power behind all matter and all material manifestations, of which the scientific man, as such, knows only the effects. Thus while the conscience reveals to us a scale of nobility in action and motives which postulates Kant's "categorical imperative," our will reveals to us a power behind nature akin to itself. From the data of these two, conscience and will, must be built our belief in the existence, the power and the goodness of God. Such is the conception which "links each to each" the successive phases of Martineau's thought, and Mr. Carpenter with rare insight and discrimination traces their gradual evolution and transformation, and so gives us a fascinating and luminous picture of the progress through far the greater part of a century of a mind of singular subtlety and power. For Martineau, while remaining faithful to these fundamental conceptions from the dawn of his independent thinking to the close, was nevertheless constantly modifying and reconstructing his systematic expositions, in obedience to the movements of thought round him or the internal pressure of his own development. Indeed his biographer leaves us somewhat in doubt at the close whether his final exposition, presented to the public when he was over eighty years of age, did not still present a transition scheme in which modifications in the erection consequentially demand a reconstruction of the foundations more thoroughgoing than had been called for in any of the previous transformations.

But in spite of the keen interest of the expositions of Martineau's thought which this volume contains, it will doubtless be more valued yet for its revelation of a singularly gracious and inspiring personality. All who came into direct contact, however slight, with Martineau, were impressed by a moral and spiritual elevation which seemed to tell that his habitual conversation was in regions dimly or rarely realised by ordinary humanity. Hampered as he was throughout his life with an invincible reserve, he was the most sympathetic and enlightening of counsellors to any who dared to break through the approaches. Those who gave him their intimate confidences were amazed both by his moral insight and by his practical sagacity as a "spiritual director"; and those who knew no more of him than they could see in his outward semblance, in the very lines of feature and figure, felt the impress of an uncomprehended greatness. When at the age of eighty-three he received his honorary degree at Oxford, undergraduates who knew nothing of him except vaguely that he was a person whose works were to be studied, if at all, cautiously and under direction, received him with an ovation such as one would expect only a popular hero of the day to evoke; and many of them still remember the impression of a great personality which they then received.

Professor Carpenter's volume will give to all of these, however far out on the fringe or however near to the centre of the range of personal influence they may have been, a closer knowledge of the man as he really was. It will help to reveal to them the inner workings of the mind and soul from which such transcendent power of waking enthusiasm issued. To those who never knew him it will explain the feelings of those who did. It is difficult to imagine any class of readers who will easily set down this biography when once they have opened it. The stress of interest will indeed vary, but the admirable lucidity of Mr. Carpenter's arrangement will render the process of skipping easy and comparatively safe; and no one who is interested in great movements of thought, or in the growth and progress of a human soul, or in the mystery of a great personality, can fail to find matter for delight.

PHILIP H. WICKSTEED.

THE FRENCH AT HOME

Home Life in France. By M. BETHAM-EDWARDS. With twenty Illustrations. (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

It is curious, as Count Bernstorff observed the other day, how little nations really know of one another, in spite of all our modern facilities of communication, and this is particularly true of France and England, separated as they have been by innumerable old traditions of contempt, ignorance, and downright hostility. Fortunately, a brighter day has already dawned, to the unspeakable relief and delight of the faithful band who believed and worked and watched through all the darkness of the Fashoda crisis and of the Dreyfus agitation. Among that faithful band Miss Betham-Edwards has every right to be considered a leader. For many years she has lived much in France, and has acquired a profound knowledge especially of the middle and working classes of the people. The instinctive reserve which she rightly notes as one of the most deeply rooted qualities of the French character was evidently not long able to resist her intelligent sympathy. This Englishwoman must at first have considerably astonished her French friends, who no doubt expected some of those insufferable airs of superiority which the British traveller on the Continent is only too apt to display. But there are many English who have lived as much in France as Miss Betham-Edwards and know the people as well as she does, without possessing her really striking power of giving literary form and shape to her experiences. No one writer, not even Mr. Bodley himself, can ever succeed in drawing what may be called a full-length picture of a whole nation, but every one who has the requisite combination of real knowledge and gift of literary expression can do something towards clearing away the mass of ignorance and misconception which still exists between French and English.

It is not so very long ago that guileless British youth used to be taught to find a sinister significance in the lack of any regular word for "home" in the French vocabulary, and only too many English travellers and writers of the past have assisted in cultivating that ludicrously false idea of our neighbours as essentially light-minded, pleasure-loving, irresponsible mannikins, which is by no means yet eradicated on this side of the Channel. From this point of view Miss Betham-Edwards' book is to be heartily welcomed, and also, we hasten to add, for its own sake. It is brightly written, and full of entertaining little personal reminiscences of the kind which do more to explain France to the average English mind than pages of psychological studies appealing only to the cultivated few.

"National traits and idiosyncrasy as evidenced in daily life are more readily grasped," says our author, "than scientific generalisations, and more profitably illustrate national character for those obliged to content themselves with vicarious acquaintance."

It must be candidly admitted that the French themselves are to some extent responsible for the misconceptions as to their national characteristics which have prevailed in this country. They are often whimsically self-depreciative; it is their humour to put perhaps an undue strain on the power of penetration possessed by the confiding stranger. Moreover, their home life is a complete contrast to ours in respect of its seclusion. We are, if anything, too careless in admitting casual acquaintances, and even complete strangers, to the intimacy of our domestic hearths. In France there is something positively Oriental in the way in which the home is guarded against intruders, at the price of an apparent unsociableness. Miss Betham-Edwards brings this out admirably, together with what is both its justification and its compensation—namely, this nation's incomparable genius for friendship. The Frenchman's affections are concentrated on a few persons—indeed, our author might have said more about the old family friend, who is an extremely important factor in French society.

Another deeply rooted cause of English misunderstanding of the French nature is to be found in the general character of modern French fiction. Miss Betham-Edwards does not hesitate to say that "French writers of fiction stand as culprits at the bar. So gravely have they sinned against truth and the fitness of things that the average novel must be accepted as a travesty, no more resembling French domestic life than the traditional caricature of John Bull by our neighbours resembles the typical Englishman. Were middle-class homes, indeed, of a piece with certain portraiture, the words 'family' and 'fireside' were mere figures of speech and simulacra over the water. The misconceptions created by so-called realistic novels are almost ineradicable. . . . It is hardly necessary to say that such works are not found upon drawing-room tables on the other side of the Channel. In the case of young daughters, maternal censorship is rigid, the Russian blacking-out system not more so."

The native patronage of such novels, she explains, would not suffice to keep their authors going. Russia is by far their best customer, Germany and England following suit, and much of the worst trash, we believe, is exported to South America.

Miss Betham-Edwards attaches a pretty wide connotation to "Home Life," for she includes chapters on "Messieurs les Députés," "The Professor of Agriculture," "An Aspirant to the Comédie Française," and "La Maison Paternelle, or Reformatory for Young Gentlemen." But her readers have no reason to complain, for she shows, in dealing with these subjects, the same lively play of fancy and shrewd observation as in the more strictly domestic chapters. No one, even one who knows France very well, could help being interested in her book, while those whose knowledge of our neighbours is limited to what may be gathered from occasional visits en touriste will find it of real value, though they may perhaps be advised not to believe every word of it. For the fact is that there is one serious drawback to Miss Betham-Edwards, considered as an authority on France, and that is her hostility to the Roman Catholic Church. She is evidently conscious of it, and honestly tries to prevent herself from being influenced by it. Indeed, one of her most delightful chapters is devoted to "My Friend Monsieur le Curé," with whom, whenever he called in the afternoon, she invariably had a long theological discussion. But her little prejudice peeps out now and again, and especially in the exaggerated importance which she attaches to the position of Protestantism in France. The inquirer who seeks to learn something of the ways of the Faubourg and the French upper classes generally will find but little enlightenment from Miss Betham-Edwards, but into the national life as a whole she shows an extraordinary insight—notably its fine taste, dignified simplicity, and freedom from vulgar display. Some passages, showing how completely she has thrown aside certain traditional British prejudices, may be quoted:

"The essential education of the French girl does not rest with masters and mistresses, but with her mother, and is sedulously, unremittently carried on in the home. It is an education wholly apart from books, or a training of eye and ear. Its object is neither pedagogic nor didactic, but social. The pupil is to be trained for society, the world, and, above all, for her future position as wife, mother, mistress. . . . If less spontaneous than her English sister, it is because she has been taught from childhood upwards to control her impulses and weigh her words—in short, to remember that she belongs to a highly polished society, and its consequent responsibilities.

On the subject of the French marriage system she says:

"May there not be as much chance of happiness and comfort in these marriages as in the happy-go-lucky wedlock English maidens so often enter upon of their own accord? The tree must be judged by its fruits. Where do we find closer unions, tenderer wives, more devoted husbands than in France? Where the system of the mariage de convenance proves a fiasco we often find parental adulation to blame, the spoiling of character by over-indulgence in childhood, the development of egotism and wilfulness by inordinate fondling from the cradle upwards. Such cases are, fortunately, not the rule, but the exception."

In conclusion, Miss Betham-Edwards is to be heartily congratulated on the interesting series of photographs which various French friends have given her to illustrate her book.

ELIZABETHAN MUSIC

An Elizabethan Virginal Book. By E. W. NAYLOR, Mus. Doc. (Dent, 6s. net.)

It is well known to students of musical history that in the sixteenth century our native instrumentalists were unsurpassed in Europe. In respect of music for the keyed instruments, both composition and performance reached a point which marked the reigns of Elizabeth and James as a "culminating period." A singularly rapid decline followed, when music for the viols found favour.

For some inexplicable reason, "Parthenia," a small collection which appeared in 1611, was the only virginal music printed. But we possess a number of manuscripts containing virginal and organ music, which completely replace the lack of published collections. German antiquaries have frequently complained that these manuscripts have not been made generally accessible; recently the reproach has been removed by Messrs. Barclay Squire and Fuller-Maitland, who edited the largest of all, which is preserved in the Fitzwilliam Museum, Cambridge. It was written in the reign of James I., and contains no less than 291 compositions, almost all English. They fill nearly 1000 printed pages, and the great extent and cost have somewhat daunted the public; while many subscribers have found too little variety in the different pieces. Dr. Naylor, organist of Emmanuel College, has now issued a work dealing entirely with the collection, which should help considerably towards due appreciation of its value. He has made a list of the best pieces, about seventy in all. He has classified and described the various styles employed, which are: the fashionable dances of the period; "Fancies" on one subject (which we now call fugues), or on a succession of unconnected subjects; transcriptions of songs and madrigals; illustrative or descriptive attempts (Dr. Naylor prefers the name "Fancy pieces"); scientific counterpoint on the Hexachord, besides organ music. Perhaps the most remarkable numbers are the sets of Variations, which Dr. Naylor has treated incidentally in several places, though a separate chapter might have been expected. His critical remarks are enlightening in several directions, and evince a wide knowledge of modern music, with appreciation of the qualities which in all times make for righteousness. It might be wished that his knowledge of other Virginal Books were more complete. Grove's "Dictionary" (art. "Virginal Music") contains an elaborate catalogue of four MSS. only; and Dr. Naylor, as others have done, seems to imagine there are no others preserved. In Seiffert's edition of Weitzmann's "Geschichte des Klavierspiels" several others are described; and Mr. Henry Davey catalogued many more in the "Monatshefte für Musikgeschichte" for 1902. Comparison of the Fitzwilliam MS. with the other remains would have been advisable. Above all, Brit. Mus. Addit. MS. 23623 (a MS. of Bull's music) should have been examined. Dr. Naylor would have found therein a fugue of Bull's upon the theme which Peter Philips (and Byrd) used, rubricated and the entries numbered. Fingering is occasionally marked in these early manuscripts; but Dr. Naylor is, we think, not justified in assuming that the marking is contemporary with the original.

We should like to see Dr. Naylor's selection from the Fitzwilliam MS. published separately. Anthologies are as necessary for music as for literature. "The Middle Ages are an immense graveyard of poems," while the last five centuries, especially the seventeenth, are an immense graveyard of musical compositions.

GOOD SPADE WORK

A Register of National Bibliography. By W. P. COURTNEY. (Constable, 2 vols., 31s. 6d. net.)

To have accomplished, as the work, practically, of one man, a task such as Mr. W. P. Courtney here presents, is an exceedingly creditable performance. He has done what required to be done, and has thereby earned the hearty gratitude of all who have to work amongst books and all whose studies lead them in definite grooves. It is the first step towards that fuller and more detailed National Bibliography, which we hope may some day be undertaken by the Bibliographical Society, a continuation and correction of Lowndes, with ample justice done to secondary writers, and accurate collations given of the more important works. But such a task cannot be carried through now by one man alone, and Mr. Courtney's volumes are evidence of this. Even within the limited range he set for himself there are important omissions in his lists, which would not, we think, have occurred had he had "assessors," who knew their special subjects as well as he knows his. Only students of bibliography can appreciate the immense labour that has gone to the making of these two books, and if we are compelled to point out a few defects, it is because we feel sure the work will soon proceed to a second edition and become an indispensable tool in every library.

We do not think Mr. Courtney's publishers were well advised in printing his lists on a demy octavo page practically marginless. They should either have doubled the number of volumes to four, and substantially decreased the amount of type on the page to admit of the annotations and additions every one who uses the work will want to make, or they should have issued the volumes interleaved.

And we think Mr. Courtney would have done better had he arranged his various books under their sub-sections and main headings alphabetically by means of key-words, rather than by date. He does arrange his sub-sections in this way, e.g., under Netherlands, we get biography, churches of, colonies, and so forth, but the books under those sub-sections are arranged in the order of their dates, and, when the list is a long one, of infinite variety, as is often the case, the search for cognate volumes becomes somewhat irritating.

A glance through the pages has indicated that there are certain gaps Mr. Courtney should fill in his next issue. Genest's ten volumes on the Stage do not appear under any heading we have noticed, though they are indispensable to every investigation concerned with Plays in England from 1660 to 1830. "A Catalogue of the Library of the Institute of Accountants in Glasgow" is given, but what about the Library of the London Institute of Chartered Accountants? The one reference under "Ale Songs" could have several companions. Under "Anglo-Saxon," Searle's "Onomasticon Anglo-Saxonicum" should have been given. Since a reference is given under "Ballantyne and Co.," to the work dealing with the history of that press and its connection with Sir Walter Scott, a reference should have been given to Lang's "Life of Lockhart." Greenhill's bibliography of Sir Thomas Browne's "Religio Medici" is mentioned, but not the bibliography of Browne's "Hydriotaphia" and "Garden of Cyrus," in a companion volume of the same series. Only Tutin's bibliographies are given under Crashaw, the bibliographical notes in Grosart's and other complete editions being overlooked. No mention is made of the lists and other material in Mr. Wicksteed's edition of Dr. Karl Witte's "Essays on Dante." The writer of an excellent little life of De Foe is not W. Whitton. We have not been able to trace a reference to Mr. C. S. Sherborn's monumental "Index Animalium," where an exhaustive list of the rarer literature concerned with the nomenclature of animals is given, nor to Sir Frederick Pollock and Dr. Maitland's "History of English Law before the time of Edward I.," and all the early texts mentioned therein. The bibliographies of the writings of Hazlitt in Mr. W. C. Hazlitt's Memoirs of his grandfather, and in Messrs. A. R. Waller and Arnold Glover's edition of his collected works do not appear under "Hazlitt," but only Ireland's incomplete list; whilst, under Lamb, Mr. W. Macdonald's bibliographical notes are mentioned, but not Mr. E. V. Lucas', "which is absurd." Neither under Butler nor Hudibras is there any mention of Mr. R. B. Johnson's excellent lists of the illustrated and other editions given in his edition of Butler's Poems. The bibliographical lists in Mr. George Somes Layard's "Life and Letters of Charles Keene" are not given under Keene, nor is Mr. M. H. Spielmann's "History of Punch" quoted, though it gives valuable aid in identifying the work of contributors to that Journal. Under "Mary, the Virgin," there should have been a reference to Mr. Orby Shipley's "Carmina Mariana," and under "Medicine," to Sir Michael Foster's "Lectures on the History of Physiology during the Sixteenth, Seventeenth and Eighteenth Centuries."

Perhaps it is a counsel of perfection, but it would have been of considerable use if, under the entries of catalogues to private libraries, such as F. Locker-Lampson's, some indication had been given to the inquirer of the general nature of the books in the library mentioned, or of any sections of it held in special esteem by the collector, e.g., the Voyages and Bibles in the Huth collection. M. Ch. Pierrot's "Table Générale et Analytique" should have been mentioned under Sainte-Beuve, and, under Persia, Professor E. G. Browne's "Catalogue of Persian Manuscripts in the Cambridge University Library." Mr. T. Hutchinson's edition should have been given under Wordsworth—but here we must stop. These additions have occurred to us during a glance through the book, and by no means after an exhaustive examination. The list could be considerably increased, and it is obvious that, to obtain the best results, a work of this nature should be the product of many minds. None the less grateful are we to Mr. W. P. Courtney for trenching the ground and planning out the first beds. He has done the journeyman's work, that which obtains fewest half-pence and most kicks, and it will be a comparatively easy matter to put in the flowers.

TRAVELS IN CANADA

Canada As It Is. By JOHN FOSTER FRASER. (Cassell, 6s.)

MR. JOHN FOSTER FRASER has already done great service to home-staying people by his brilliant sketches of distant lands. Such books as he has now written on America, Siberia and Canada partake, indeed, of journalism rather than literature. But they are journalism at its best. They are the vivid impressions of a trained traveller, who never forgets that his first duties are observation and inquiry.

There is no country in the world which lies more clear and open to the observer than Canada. Mr. Foster Fraser has had no reason to rely, as he was compelled to rely in Siberia, on official information. Every Canadian is willing to talk about his country. Every Canadian politician or Cabinet Minister is easily accessible. Every Canadian family, from the remotest ranche up to Government House, is intensely hospitable. Statistical information abounds. The diligent inquirer receives from the Canadian officials piles of blue-books without payment, and, if he is really bent on business, he will receive every help from the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Armed with such powers, Mr. Foster Fraser went to Canada last autumn, travelled East and West through every province, and brought home a mass of material which he has worked up into the present book. He neglects no aspect of the country—the fruit-gardens of Ontario, the factories of Montreal and Toronto, the wheat-fields of Manitoba, the passes of the Rocky Mountains, or the lumber-forests of British Columbia. Mr. Foster Fraser has looked into every nook and cranny of all these countries with keen journalistic eye, and has swiftly penned his impressions.

It is, indeed, a book of impressions. At times, Mr. Foster Fraser argues and expounds. But he is at his best when he just gives you the actual clean-cut impression of travel. Take this description of the prairie:

"For miles I rode across virgin prairie. It was clean grass-land with gentle bosom-risings right to the horizon. Then I dipped into a region where man had come with his strength, and the prairie was a mother—fecund, proud, joyous, bringing forth one hundred million bushels of wheat."

Or this description of a ride over the Rockies on a cow-catcher:

"We dived and we curved; we snorted uphill and rattled, steam off, down hill, taking gently when the work was hard, letting her rip, 'free-wheeling,' when there was a dip. I say we, because the engine acted like a human being. We were tuned. The engine enjoyed it, I am certain, quite as much as I did——" and so forth. The writing is always strong, vigorous, effective. There is no reflection or meditation—none of those calm distances, long thoughts, that you find in the masters of travel literature: you are hustled along by the keen exhilaration of this energetic, inquisitive personality. It is like travelling in a motor-car.

Not that the work is superficial. Mr. Fraser has gone out of his way to make a thorough inquiry into the condition of those curious people, the Doukhobors, who were brought over to Canada some years ago with the help of the Empress-Dowager of Russia. The Canadian Government has had some trouble with these good, simple souls; but Mr. Fraser testifies that they are worthy of patience, and gives them the very best character as emigrants.

Into the whole question of emigration, Mr. Fraser goes very thoroughly. He has interviewed hundreds of emigrants and settlers—from the families which he found going out in the steerage on the Tunisian to the settlers whom he found, in every stage of settlement, on the great wheat-fields of the North-West. The information he gives should be most valuable to the intending emigrant. It is shrewd, and yet enterprising. He does not underrate the difficulties of the climate. He is all in favour of an emigrant "going slow" at first, and learning his trade before saddling himself with a huge tract of virgin forest. But, with all the difficulties, he still finds in Canada one of the great countries of the future—still with vast, unpeopled territories, yearning for population, greeting the immigrant with open arms.

Visiting Canada at such a moment, it was impossible for Mr. Fraser to keep entirely outside the fiscal controversy. He is in favour of preferential tariffs, but states his case temperately and fairly. He gives us the Canadian point of view very fully, and had some peculiarly good opportunities of gauging it.

Altogether, this is one of the best books on Canada that have been produced for a long time.

THE ARROW

By peat-black waters flecked with foam,
She lay beneath the flaming west;
I plucked the arrow from her breast,
And staunched the wound; and bore her home.

Before the hearth's warm-glowing peat,
I laid her on my bracken-bed;
And loosed the dank hair round her head;
And chafed her snow-cold hands and feet,

Until the living colour crept
Through her young body; and her eyes
Looked into mine with still surprise
Once only, ere she softly slept.

Yet, though she wakened not nor stirred,
I gazed in those dark eyes all night
Within the peat-glow, till the light
Of morning roused some restless bird;

When, in the dawning's drowsy grey,
With watching spent, I fell asleep;
And slumbered till the bleat of sheep
Awakened me; and it was day.

Cold on my brow I felt the wind
That gently flapped the unlatched door,
And stirred the bracken on the floor
Whereon I looked, and thought to find

Beauty yet slumbering in the gold
Of withered fern; but no dark head
Now nestled in the bracken-bed
That rustled in the dawn-wind cold;

And she was gone—I knew not where;
I only knew that I must go
To seek her ever, high and low,
O'er hills and valleys of despair.

So flinging wide the flapping door,
I turned my back upon my home.
By peat-black waters flecked with foam,
From dawn till dark, for evermore,

O'er moss and fell, I keep my quest,
Grown old and frail, with failing breath;
Though now I know that only death
May pluck the arrow from my breast.

THE REMOVAL OF THE MARCIANA LIBRARY AT VENICE

THE transportation of the Library at St. Mark in Venice from the Ducal Palace to the Palazzo della Zecca, or of the Mint, has at last been accomplished. The project for moving it has been under consideration for no less than twenty years; but owing to bureaucratic delays and the obstacles consequent on an ever shifting succession of ministries the scheme has only now been carried out. At first sight it would seem as though Venice had intended to honour the memory of Petrarch in this way, for the sixth centenary of the poet had just been celebrated throughout Italy with pomp and enthusiasm, and Petrarch may to some extent be looked upon as the founder of the Marciana. The circumstance was however entirely fortuitous: and though the Municipality of Venice have arranged to present the Library with the poet's bust in honour of the double event, the gift would doubtless have been made had the removal taken place either prior to or after this anniversary.

A history of the Library and its vicissitudes, by Professor Count Antonio Medin (from which much of the following account is taken) forms one of the articles in the Italian periodical La Lettura for the month of April, and in it the author sarcastically remarks that we may be perfectly sure that had the Marciana not proved so perilous and inconvenient a guest it would never have been moved from the palace of the Doges. A less suitable site for a public library could not be conceived: and when, twelve years before his death, Petrarch settled to bequeath his books to Venice, intending thereby to found a "great and famous library," like unto those of olden times, he certainly never dreamt of its encumbering the palace of the rulers of the State. His legacy did not fulfil its purpose. The books were dispersed, and few of those originally belonging to Laura's lover are now to be found in Venice.

A happier fate awaited the volumes and manuscripts presented in 1468 by Cardinal Bessarion to the Republic. The collection of this learned prelate comprised over a thousand Greek and Latin codexes, and had been obtained at a cost of more than 30,000 golden ducats—a sum equivalent to about £120,000 of our money. To show their appreciation and gratitude the Government decided in 1515 to build a palace at the Piazzetta fit to house so valuable a possession. The commission was entrusted to Jacopo Sansovino, who in 1553 completed the edifice, which was afterwards embellished with paintings by Paolo Veronese and Tintoretto, and with stucco work by Alessandro Vittoria. The manuscripts were all chained to shelves in those days, and remained secured in this way till the end of the "Seicento." These manuscripts did not increase to any marked degree till the eighteenth century, when legacies from the houses of Contarini, and Recanatì, together with the library of Giusto Fontanini (which the Republic pronounced forfeit to itself) added largely to the numbers. Napoleon I. then ordered the clearance of the "Libreria Vecchia"—as it was called—in order that he might add it to the Royal palace. Accordingly, in 1812, the Marciana was transferred to the Palazzo Ducale, where it was placed all about the building, in such a fashion as to necessitate a quantity of alterations and readjustments that certainly did not tend to the safety or stability of the palace. Many a public office had, indeed, been set up in this seat of Venice's rulers, but none proved so troublesome as the Library, for its encroachments crept on with perilous insistence, its original number of 50,000 volumes swelling to 200,000, and adding the danger of its weight to the inconvenience of its size.

The importunity of one librarian after another availed little. The Ministry of Public Instruction in Rome, to whom these appeals were made, found means to put off or evade the business, and had it not been for the fall of the Campanile the Library would probably have remained for ever stowed away in the recesses of the Doge's Palace. The warning note rung by the great belfry when on July 14, 1902 it tottered to its fall—fulfilling even in death a sacred, solemn mission—re-echoed throughout Venice. The dread that every large and heavy building was in peril stirred every one's mind, and the authorities in Rome urged on the work of removing the ponderous tomes from a fabric which was never calculated to bear them. The palace of the Zecca, which in 1900 had been selected as the most appropriate spot in which some day to house the books, was ordered to be prepared without delay. This building offered advantages of no mean order. It stood close to the Palazzo Ducale, so that the distance for conveying the books, manuscripts, etc., was short; its proximity to the "Libreria Vecchia" seemed to endow it with the needed traditions; the fact of there being a building large enough, strong enough, and suitable enough, to house the Marciana was in itself a reason to select the Palazzo della Zecca. This house, in which the ducats of the "Serenissima" were once coined, and where the "cell of the chests" (cella degli scrigni)—though empty now—is still seen, is spoken of at the end of the sixteenth century by Francesco Sansovino, the architect's son, as being remarkable for the solidity and compactness of its construction. "What is striking," he says, "is that it is closely woven below as well as above of stone, bricks and iron, without there being an ounce of wood to be found. So that for strength and for security against fire there is no place whatever that can be compared with it."

This old place, destined once for so different a purpose, has been excellently well arranged as a library. The ample courtyard in the centre has been covered in with a glass roof, forming now a spacious, light, commodious reading-room, well ventilated, sheltered and warm, and capable of seating from 100 to 120 readers. Other rooms are set apart for the study of manuscripts; others for general and Venetian works of reference; others serve as offices, and all are furnished plainly yet handsomely. The bulk of the Library is housed in long corridors, on shelves, in book-cases and scaffoldings all of iron, and all made in the latest and most approved fashion. The catalogues are kept on the ground floor, and are easily accessible to students.

The difference between the former site and the present one is untold. In the Doge's Palace the drawbacks were endless. The books had to be poked away in whatever space could be spared for them; and the strange, remote corners in which they were buried made it a puzzle how any volume could ever be disinterred from the involved, intricate labyrinth which constituted one of the finest libraries of Italy. The luckless student had sometimes to wait for an hour, and even occasionally to return the following day, while the still more luckless attendant searched among the hidden passages and recesses for the needed volume. The hours, too, for study had to be limited to the daytime, for, rightly enough, no lights could be permitted in the Ducal Palace, the risk of fire being too great to run at any price. The work of removal, begun early in August 1904, and finished early in November of the same year, was carried out with such method and organisation that not one pamphlet was missing, and at the beginning of December the Library was again open to the public, and in complete working order. The merit of all this is chiefly due to Dr. S. Morpurgo, the able head of the Marciana, whose energy, determination, and intelligence have at last been crowned with success. He has been supported by an able staff, and more especially by his efficient sub-librarians, Dr. Giulio Coggiola, Dr. Gino Levi, and Dr. Arnoldo Segarizzi.

The opening ceremony was performed by H.R.H. the Duke of Genoa, the Minister of Public Instruction, and many leading authorities of the town.

ALETHEA WIEL.

THE PERILS OF ORTHOGRAPHIC REFORM

THE literatures of France and England have reached the happy stage in their history when a great and constant interchange of style and spirit passes between them, and each is keenly sensitive to the evolution of the other. It is hardly too much to say that the two languages have become mutually dependent, as the two nations, in character, temperament and intelligence, are complementary; and there is more than a grain of truth in the view that the qualities of French literature to-day are those of English literature to-morrow. So that the interest we feel in the question of the reform of orthography, which still continues to provoke much discussion in Paris, is increased by the feeling that the movement is safe to reproduce itself here at no distant date.

It seems strange that when the subject of "spelling reform"—as it is vulgarly and inaccurately called—is raised by its advocates, the nation fails to see the vital and revolutionary nature of the attack, which, in effect, involves changes of perhaps not less importance than, let us say, the rightful settlement of a certain political problem now agitating the country. On the one hand we have the advantage of simplifying spelling in order that language may be made easier to those who use it least: on the other we have the danger of deracinating a host of ancient and beautiful usages, teeming with reminiscences of history and heroism, brilliant with reflections of poetic colouring, and sanctified by the approval of authors, statesmen, and scholars without number.

The matter has never been better treated than by M. Edmond Rostand, in the long poem he contributed to the Figaro before the illness which, not many weeks ago, compelled him temporarily to lay aside all work. (We are disposed to ask, in passing, what London journal would have given five of its best columns to a copy of verses on a disputed question of orthography?) The poet inagines himself to be in a vast library at night, and is startled by the small but clear sounds of tearing and sighing which proceed from the shelves.

"Et parmi l'ombre où des cuivres
Luisaient encor sur du bois,
Tous les mots, dans tous les livres,
Remuèrent à la fois."

The hand of the spelling reformer is among the books, and in the hand is a pair of operating scissors, with which words are curtailed, beheaded, and otherwise mutilated:

"J'entendis, je crus entendre
Des petits pas de ciseaux
Courir dans de la chair tendre
Et trébucher sur des os."

The words cry for mercy in a chorus which is equally remarkable as a triumph of poetic artifice and as a specimen of perfect scholarship:

"Ah! disaient ces mots en larmes,
Nous sommes pourtant les mots,
Vos amis, vos fleurs, vos armes,
Vos talismans, vos émaux!"

Several single words undertake their own defence, and in each case the chorus comments on their plaintive regrets with an irony which spelling reformers will find very wounding. In the following pair of stanzas M. Rostand gives expression, in phrases of exquisite music and truth, to the meditations of every artist in words:

"Le Chœur chantait; 'La merveille
Du beau mot mystérieux,
C'est qu'on le lit de l'oreille
Et qu'on l'écoute des yeux!"

"Ce sortilège est le nôtre
Que si, de nos deux beautés,
Vous ôtez l'une, c'est l'autre
Que peut-être vous ôtez!"

Who would have thought it possible that a poet could stir our heart profoundly with a statement of grammar? These wonderful verses are instinct with the most refined pathos. They impress the reader with a sense of the sacrilege and barbarity of crippling a splendid language, and form a contemptuously crushing reply to spelling reformers of the crudest type—those who can see in the written word nothing but a vehicle for indicating pronunciation—a series of signs having no more essential charm or value than resides in shorthand or algebra:

"Mais des cris de scoliastes
Annonçaient incessamment
Qu'on procédait à de vastes
Travaux d'enlaidissement."

"Le char d'or de chaque idée
Devenait un omnibus
Roulant sa lourdeur bondée
Dans un gâchis de rébus!"

The advocacy of the standard orthography is complete: it has elevated grammar almost to the height of sublimity; it is final. Readers will not, however, assume, from these polished verses, that M. Rostand, or that scholars in general, are absolutely opposed to all orthoëpic reform. There are instances—in English and French alike—where the accepted spelling is wrong from every standpoint. To mention only the most obvious example: the form "rhyme" is quite unjustifiable, and every scholar is aware that "rime" must reassume its place. But such cases are not very numerous. The great rock on which "spelling reform" splits is the ludicrous assumption that a purely phonetic form of word is that which is theoretically perfect. Every lover of English or French will echo the concluding sentiment of M. Rostand:

"Et jamais je n'ai, peut-être,
Su comme aujourd'hui je sais
Que j'adore chaque lettre
De chacun des mots français."

The movement for orthographic reform has thus at least the merit of forcing us to realise the treasure we possess.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THOMAS EDWARD BROWN

WHEN a friend of Brown's remarked on the omission of his name from a magazine article on Minor Poets, he said, with a smile: "Perhaps I am among the Major." And he was right. For there is nothing minor about the work of this essentially individual writer; it has no pettiness, no mere prettiness, no easy imitative languors; it is strong, direct, finely human. Perhaps it would hardly be fair to say that Henley discovered him, but he certainly owed to his old Gloucester pupil a wider recognition and the encouragement of a virile appreciation. It was for nature, and poetry, and the soul of man that Brown cared always. It was so when he left the Isle of Man for Christ Church, Oxford, where he took a double First and at twenty-four was a Fellow of Oriel; it was so when he was school-mastering at Gloucester and Clifton; it was so when at last he settled in the Isle of Man to end his days. He was a master for close on forty years, yet there is no trace in his work of the narrowness of outlook which so often comes of the routine of teaching. "He seemed in possession," a friend said, "of some great secret of nature which he was not free to impart to us." But in his letters and his verse he imparted it marvellously well.

Brown's letters are amongst the best that we have; his place is, surely, among the first twelve English letter-writers, and by no means at the bottom of the list. His letters have insight, humour, tenderness, an exquisite felicity of phrase, and a profound sense of beauty. "I like," he said, "to please my friends," and these letters of his were gifts. Here is a vivid picture:

"We have been much, of late, to Ballaglass . . . The other day we discovered an old weaver there, and his wife. The man was a handsome old fellow, fair and sunny-looking in his advanced years; the wife a brunette, 'with eyes of flame,' wrinkled like a sibyl, the remains of a terrible beauty upon her. And it turned out that she was from my parish (Braddan), and knew all about me and mine. Wonderful! the old times lived again; my father, with circumstance of the minutest accuracy, the little vicarage, the church, the very flies and gnats of contemporary gossip preserved in this amber. She was like a stick of amber. How she laughed, how she cried, how she clasped her hands, and 'blest her soul,' and 'dear me'd,' and wrapped me in a san benito of sympathy and fire—God help me! and how foolish we were! . . . And the old weaver weaves rugs, and is now weaving one for me. I think he is rather exorbitant! But who cares what exorbitance when the glory of the accident transcends the 'orb' of 'common doin's' so magnificently."

For a piece of tense description what could be better than this of Caldron Snout, in Teesdale?

"We look up to the comby crest where it first gets a notion of what is before it; under us is the straight arrowy myriad-lined thrust of the absolute energy, full of hate and insane purpose. We climb a bit of rock, and above the fall we see grey and melancholy preparations, a long dim claymore riveted into a background of hills; the hills black with a lustrous blackness as of Hamburg grapes; beyond all a blue-white sky, almost intolerably clear."

From moods of roystering fun these letters pass to moods of bereavement in which Brown could write: "The winsomest of all my friends, the purest, the most honourable and stainless. I am lonely here, specially so just now, and I expatiate in a wide field of sorrow; it is a field of tombs becoming more and more populous."

Brown's Manx stories in verse, "Fo'c's'le Yarns," are probably the best known portion of his work. They are packed with character, intense, masterful. He knew his native islanders in and out, and wove their joys and sorrows into verse quick with life. "Tommy Big-Eyes," "The Doctor," "Christmas Rose," and above all "Bella Gorry," are things apart in literature. For to a great narrative gift (one feels sure that Brown could have written a fine novel) is added authentic poetry and an absolute command of his medium. But the tales are written in dialect, and for some perverse reason dialect poetry is rather shunned. Yet, as I have said, these "Yarns" are probably better known than Brown's other work, those lyrics and imaginings into which he put the rapture and ardour and sadness of his spirit.

He had the highest gift of all, the lyrical, and he sometimes expressed it in the quaintest and daintiest forms, as in "Vespers":

"O blackbird, what a boy you are!
How you do go it!
Blowing your bugle to that one sweet star—
How you do blow it!
And does she hear you, blackbird boy, so fàr?
Or is it wasted breath?
'Good Lord! she is so bright
To-night!
The blackbird saith."

And again, in "My Garden":

"A garden is a lonesome thing, God wot!
Rose plot,
Fringed pool,
Ferned grot—
The veriest school
Of peace; and yet the fool
Contents that God is not—
Not God! in gardens when the eve is cool?
Nay, but I have a sign;
'Tis very sure God walks in mine."

In "Cleveden Verses" and "Aber Stations" Brown expressed one of the profoundest sorrows of his life, the loss of his boy. I quote two stanzas from the former:

"She knelt upon her brother's grave,
My little girl of six years old—
He used to be so good and brave,
The sweetest lamb of all our fold;
He used to shout, he used to sing,
Of all our tribe the little king—
And so unto the turf her ear she laid,
To hark if still in that dark place he played."

"No sound! no sound!
Death's silence was profound!
And horror crept
Into her aching heart, and Dorá wept.
If this is as it ought to be,
My God, I leave it unto thee."

Brown had the sea passion in his blood; it sings through all his verse; with the sea and mountains he was at home. In his long solitary walks he grew into a unity with nature that at times almost made him dumb with inexpressible thoughts. But he, more wise than many poets, did not attempt to express the inexpressible, so that his poetry always had clarity and definition of idea. What a superb fancy is that of "The Schooner," "rotten from the gunwale to the keel, rat-riddled, bilge-bestank," which leaves the harbour for the open sea:

"And now, behold! a shadow of repose
Upon a line of gray,
She sleeps, that transverse cuts the evening rose—
She sleeps, and dreams away,
Soft blended in a unity of rest
All jars, and strifes obscene, and turbulent throes
'Neath the broad benediction of the West—
Sleeps; and methinks she changes as she sleeps,
And dies, and is a spirit pure.
Lo! on her deck an angel pilot keeps
His lonely watch secure;

And at the entrance of Heaven's dockyard waits,
Till from Night's leash the fine-breathed morning leaps,
And that strong hand within unbars the gates."

T. E. Brown has not yet come into his own. Friends he had, and appreciators too, during his life, but there will come a time when his splendid accomplishment will appeal to a world grown tired of little things. He was not one to carry his wares into the market-place; he was not of those who play at "the polite exercise of verse." He knew nature, and life, and art, and loved all three.

"O mother Earth, by the bright sky above thee,
I love thee, O, I love thee."

And one likes to think that this noble spirit passed suddenly and without pain.

FICTION

A New Humanity, or the Easter Island. By ADOLF WILBRANDT.
Translated from the German by Dr. A. S. RAPPOPORT.
(Maclaren, 6s.)

ADOLF WILBRANDT is the typical German man of letters. He is the author of biographies, novels and plays, he was for two years co-editor of an important newspaper, and for six, Director of the Hofburg Theatre in Vienna. He has shown himself equally capable in all capacities. Such versatility is, to say the least, unusual in this country. We do not, alas! make our men of letters directors of our theatres, nor are our novelists or playwrights commissioned to write the lives of famous authors. Wilbrandt's lives of Kleist, Hölderlin, and Fritz Reuter will always have a place in German biographical literature. His reputation, however, stands highest as a dramatist. His dramas have a secure place in the repertory of all the leading theatres of Germany. Although his directorship of the great Vienna playhouse (1881-87) gave him practical experience of the stage, his plays are rather dramatic poems than dramas. The most popular, Der Meister von Palmyra (1889), lacks dramatic power, but is full of poetry and deep thought, and what action there is centres round the early Christians, always a fascinating subject. He returned to it in a later play, Hairan (1900), which was officially forbidden in Berlin after the second performance, probably on account of the likeness of its hero to the founder of Christianity. As a novelist Wilbrandt can tell a story, and has some skill in drawing character. Like Mrs. Humphry Ward in her late productions, Wilbrandt's stories sometimes centre round persons of real life, but unlike the English novelist, he chooses from among his contemporaries. In "Hermann Ifinger," certainly his most interesting novel, he deals with the tragic fate of the painter Hans Makart. The scene is laid chiefly in Munich and he introduces as Baron Pillnitz, Count Schack, the Mæcenas of modern German painting, and under different names the group of men, among whom were Böcklin, Schwind, Feuerbach, Genelli, and Lenbach, whose works Schack purchased and placed in his gallery, now the property of the German nation, before they were known to fame. The novel before us is a translation of "Die Oster-Insel" (1894), the hero of which, Helmut Adler, stands for the philosopher, Friedrich Wilhelm Nietzsche. Adler desired to produce a new race, a new humanity, which should surpass the present one. The ape-man was to become the superman. With a few disciples suited to rear the complete man, he intended to set out for the Easter Island in the Pacific Ocean; as far as the island reaches there will be only one type of the human race:

"People who strive and aspire to something higher, who wish with all their soul to quit the half-man state, and in whom higher aspirations are stirring, whose motto is: Down with the ape-man in us, long live the god-man! For a while, we should be left alone and in peace; nobody would trouble about the fools there leading an isolated life. When, however, an enemy did appear, we should be found to have equipped ourselves with all the means of defence modern times afford, invented for us by the ape-man. We should ourselves have improved on them, our island would be a fortress, surrounded with sea-mines and electric batteries. But, above all, our best defence would be our invincible sense of honour, our inflexible courage, our knowledge that we were fighting for the future of humanity."

Unhappily, Adler, like his prototype, loses his reason, and dies before his great project can be started. Then Adler's disciples, chiefly his daughter and her betrothed, determine that the Easter Island is after all to be found in ourselves, and that the superman reveals himself in the selection of what is best in our nature. Wilbrandt's picture of Nietzsche is not attractive, nor is it wholly true, but, as the portrait of the dreamer, wrapt in himself, seeing nothing as it is, at war with the world and what he deems its mediocrity, its materialism, its hostility to new ideas, it may pass. The incidental descriptions of Rostock, the seaport town of northern Germany, where Wilbrandt was born in 1837, are interesting. But we would warn English readers who know not German, against taking this work as a sample of what Wilbrandt can do. The other books mentioned in this article would produce a very different impression. And now a word as to the translation. The attitude of English publishers to translations in general is very curious. As a rule they will have none of them, and it might be supposed therefore that English men and women were all accomplished linguists. Or, if the publishers do put forth translations of contemporary foreign works, they care not for the quality of the translation so long as the translator's fee is low. We have, however, of late noted signs of improvement; one or two translations of great excellence have been issued, and full justice has been done them in these columns. But we have seldom seen a worse piece of work as translation than the volume before us. The author of it seems to know neither German nor English. We could fill pages with a list of glaring errors and incomprehensible phrases. He writes of a man going on an expedition into the mountains as putting "washing" into his knapsack, evidently ignorant that the German word Wäsche is used for clean linen. Cryptic phrases like: "You have obstructed your life," "Shall I dirty my conscience?" "He is throwing away his money at him," abound. If a translation is worth making at all, it is worth some trouble. But a sure knowledge of the two languages concerned is a necessary qualification for the task.

Waves of Fate. By EDWARD NOBLE. (Blackwood, 6s.)

WHEN to the making of a novel have gone care, enthusiasm, and a lavish attention to human characterisation and scenic effect, it would be hard were the result to lack interest. Mr. Edward Noble's second novel is far from doing that. Yet one reluctantly records the impression that interest, even "sustained" interest, will have throughout a hard fight of it with impatience and even positive irritation on the part of those readers who pay the book the compliment of judging it by a fairly high standard. The theme is as good as need be, and full, almost too full, of workable material. In a blind gale in the Channel the Atlantic liner Sentinel outward bound, runs down the sailing-ship Coorong homeward bound from Australia, and in the confusion the captain of the sinking vessel, Arthur Norris, whose nerves had been affected by some pretty trying experiences, leaps for safety, leaving his wife and children to take their chance. The commander who has cut him down happens to be an old comrade, but the two men are as diverse in disposition as their commands, Dick Callaghan being as well disciplined, direct, and strong as the Atlantic greyhound under him, while Norris is a highly strung, sensitive character, of marked literary leanings, in whom the dreamer is gradually tending to oust the man of action. Those who have proceeded so far, who have lived on the Coorong and heard her occupants talk, and who have read the account of her sinking, from "Rain, mist, and tumbling seas" to the end, will readily anticipate the word-crowded pages of impressionism that await them when the tale passes to Liverpool, where the inquiry takes place and near which all the characters live. To strike a definite note of criticism, our main point of divergence from the author lies in our widely differing estimate of the worth of his heroine, Norris' wife. Manifestly he admires her immensely, and, broadly speaking, holds her justified. Yet here is a woman who, in the time of his extreme stress and trouble, makes little or no allowance for the husband with whom (affection apart) her own sympathetic art of music might have put her in touch; a wife who practically drifts into disloyalty upon provocation which any true woman would have withstood, however sorely it had tried her. Norris on the other hand is admittedly weak and petulant, to an extent which fritters away much sympathy, while Colonel Marchmont, who supplants him, "ought to have been shot," to use his own phrase, more than once. On the whole in spite of Callaghan and Norris' cousin Helen, who is true to a certain type admired of many, it is a second-rate cast. Mr. Noble is perhaps at his best in those passages which recount Norris' struggle with his "nerves." There are many touches here which seem intuitively true. But the author has not succeeded too well in his efforts after a vivid representation of everyday life. Some of the dialogue is inartistically "snappy" and colloquial. The pages are full of the "pishes" and "pfaughs," "tchas" "burrs" and "b-r-r-r-r-rs" of the men, the "can'ts" and "'fraid nots" of the girls, of the cries of newspaper boys and loafers, and catchwords of various professions, to say nothing of the imaginative renderings of sounds produced by telephones, ship's rudders and other machinery. And to what, by way of a riddle, do the following adjectives most appropriately apply: a "big, drooping, tilted, pinched in, puffed out, sloping away, tipping down, dull sheeny, cheeky, soft, black . . . ?"—"Well, 'hat' of course," cries a feminine authority, so here at least Mr. Noble is absolved.

The Stigma. By JESSIE LECKIE HERBERTSON. (Heinemann, 6s.)

IN spite of a tendency, that is almost morbid, to brood on what is horrible, there is undoubted power in this novel, of a strange and unpleasant kind, for it is written with a certain savage insistence that goes far to carry conviction. But Miss Herbertson does not actually succeed in doing this: by piling horror upon horror, she defeats her own end, which is presumably to show how cruel life can be, and how disgusting; and succeeds only in arousing dismay, not at life but at her presentation of life. Susan Thirlmere is the natural daughter of an irresponsible woman of pleasure. The story opens with the death of the mother, and the necessity of the girl to face her position alone. She is an artist, but failing eyesight prevents her from continuing work in the studio; and she decides to leave her one girl friend, whose brother has made overtures to her, and go to the house of a distant relative. The ménage in this house—a farm in the country—is indescribably sordid, and her occupation as warder to imbeciles is, if anything, worse. Here she lives until a solution comes to her life, in the shape of marriage with a young doctor, who is locum tenens in a neighbouring village. All this horror is quite possible, but does not appear in the least inevitable. On the contrary it is rather pointless, and with Susan we have very little sympathy; but what raises the book out of the commonplace is the character of Joan, the wife of the Methodist relative, once a dissolute flower-girl. Though there are small points in the workmanship with which we are at odds—notably the exaggeration of her dialect—the character is a remarkable study, as clever as it is revolting. It is curious that books which brood over the evils of life and sex in particular, should be frequent and often popular, and that books which contain some hint either at the root of that evil or at means by which that evil might be remedied, should be scouted as immoral. But such seems to be the case.

The Millionaire Baby. By ANNA KATHARINE GREEN. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

THE detective story has laws of its own, and must not be judged by ordinary rules of probability. Anna Katharine

Green has availed herself to the full of her opportunities, and "The Millionaire Baby" is a complication of plots and counter-plots amid which only the astute detective of fiction could hope to thread his way. The book begins with the kidnapping of the little heiress of the Ocum-paugh, and there are the requisite number of false clues and misleading coincidences to perplex the ingenious investigator and ingenuous reader. To add to the bewilderment, the little pavilion, whence the child Gwendolen disappears, must needs have a gruesome secret of its own, connected with an early tragedy of the family. Here, we think, even the lover of mystery is likely to rebel. It is possible to accept—with an effort—the extremely sensational intrigues which centre about Gwendolen, and to regard with due seriousness the episodes of the recovered shoe and the fateful bit of sugar candy. It is even possible to admit—for the purposes of the game—that the missing child could be hidden in so flimsy a disguise among people who knew her perfectly well. But the blood-bedabbled ceiling of the pavilion and the irrelevant spectral hound are really needless tests of our credulity. We do not, cannot believe in that pavilion and its ghostly horrors, in spite of the circumstantial little diagram which is evidently intended to prop up our wavering faith. There may, however, be readers more credulous: indeed, there must be, else where would be the large public of Anna Katharine Green? We will not spoil their enjoyment by hinting at the reasons for Gwendolen's abduction and Mrs. Ocum-paugh's unwillingness to recover her, or by suggesting any of the surprising events of the narrative. Suffice it to say that the story is a series of thrilling points of interrogation, and that, in Lincoln's immortal words: "If you like that sort of thing, that's the sort of thing you like."

The Fugitive Blacksmith. By CHARLES D. STEWART. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

WHATEVER charm the Irish-American dialect may have for the ear, in print it has little or none except possibly for Irish-Americans themselves. The immortal Mr. Dooley (dare we confess it?) was very troublesome to read: on the lips of some one who knew his sayings by heart, he was irresistible. We should have revelled in overhearing his talk with Hennessey: but when it comes to reading, the ordinary Englishman needs not only patience but an interpreter, to help him over the difficulties. The latter will probably not be at hand to smooth the path, and the former he will very likely regard as too valuable a possession to waste upon a mere novel. So that when, after reading some twenty pages of "The Fugitive Blacksmith," he finds himself mystified and inclined to be bored, there is a grave danger that he will shut up the book and turn to something that calls for less effort. But while admitting that he has had great provocation, we would strongly urge him to persevere. The greater part of the three hundred odd pages are written in quite intelligible English, and they contain a peculiarly fascinating story. It deals with the adventures of a fugitive from justice, or rather injustice, who, aided by remarkable agility and adroitness, evades pursuit so long as evasion is necessary. Yet it is not merely a tale of adventure. There is in it that happy American blend of excitement, humour, and pathos, which made "The Virginian" so strangely attractive; but, whereas there the pathetic element rather predominated, here the humorous is the more marked. We find a first-rate description of solitary life on the prairie and the effect of it on the mind, and an equally realistic picture of the contrariness of a rampaging pig, which had got its head stuck fast in a bucket and was brought to the blacksmith for relief. Thus tragedy and comedy alternate pleasantly throughout, and if readers will conquer their prejudice against the dialect and the spelling, they will be well rewarded. Meanwhile, in Mr. Stewart's next novel we hope to see more direct narrative and less conversation. To our thinking the model for such things is "Esmond," where the hero tells his own story but very largely in the third person.

It may be questioned whether, in reviving Mr. Gilbert's The Palace of Truth the Mermaid Repertory Theatre has been discriminate. The "fairy comedy" is in parts exceedingly amusing, and the possibilities of amusement it contains can only be exhausted in performance. In other words, its humour is in quality emotional rather than intellectual, is therefore proper to the theatre, and in consequence not only gains by perpetration on the stage but cannot be fully realised without it. As, however, it is only to a limited extent that the piece is, as will be seen, a play—as the use which it makes of the theatre is only partial—it lacks that perfection which alone entitles to perpetuation a work of art entirely frivolous.

The Palace of Truth is one wherein all who find themselves are bound, by the enchantment of the place, to speak, if they speak at all, the literal truth. In it the truth is told even though a lie be framed, and, unless he be aware of the nature of the walls that hold him, without the would-be liar even knowing he has told it. Thus it happens that the father in Mr. Gilbert's piece unconsciously gives the mother a full account of all his infidelities; that the daughter, though intent on concealing the depth of her affection, overwhelms her betrothed with amorous professions, and that he, while meaning to indulge in protestations as violent as her own, explains that he has known girls more attractive and that what has held him to her has been merely her comparative indifference. Thus it happens, also, that the damsel who desires the daughter's lover as her own, intending to approach him in the subtlest and most modest manner possible, does so in reality with an outrageously frank avowal of her designs; that two friends of the family while anxious to profess mutual esteem, acquaint each other with a very different sentiment, and that the other members of the circle proceed in a similar manner to "give themselves away." All this, as Mr. Gilbert tells it, is, in spite of an occasional inconsistency—for at times the dramatis personæ seem to realise what they are saying—extremely humorous. And, if it is humorous in the study, on the stage it is, or should be, more so still. For what makes the confidences humorous at all is not so much the nature as the circumstances of them, not so much the fact that, as the conditions under which, they are imparted; and it is only on the stage, where the conditions can be realised as vividly as in life, that their full significance becomes apparent. That a man should call his friend a liar is not necessarily humorous in itself, but that he should do so in the belief that he is paying him a compliment, and in the tone and manner which a compliment necessitate, is humorous indeed. But, in the mere recital of it, much of the humour of the situation is inevitably lost. In the study the ludicrous unsuitability of the manner to the nature of the confidence and the blank and indignant astonishment of the recipient of it can only be imagined, but on the stage they can be fully realised. In the theatre the intellectual appeal of the incident is reinforced by its appeal to the emotions, and the quiet smile occasioned by the one becomes the burst of laughter occasioned by the other.

And yet, if these incidents are proper to the theatre, considered as a whole the piece is not. The incidents in question form the only part of it which offers any play to the emotions—the only part which, requiring to be felt in order to be appreciated fully, is effective in performance. In effect, the incidents, and the changes which Mr. Gilbert rings upon them, are the piece. As a play the piece, apart from the incidents, does not exist. The situation from which the incidents arise—the presence of the characters in the Palace of Truth—is due to the reticence of the daughter and to the desire of her parents to know if she is attached to her betrothed. That there should be no more story than is necessary to create that situation is correct enough. But such story as there is is merely told; the appeal which it makes is purely intellectual. In the theatre it is therefore ineffective, and we are not interested either in it or in the characters with whom it deals. We do not care whether the daughter loves her betrothed or not, and the ultimate reconciliation gives us neither pleasure nor relief. The result is that the incidents, amusing as they are, are less amusing than they might have been. For they are interesting only in themselves, and in humour the element of interest is as valuable as it is in pathos. The impression given is that in the incidents the piece originated, and that Mr. Gilbert inserted such story as there is simply because he could not do without it. Interested only in the incidents, it was they alone he tried to realise—to make effective in the theatre. The piece seems in consequence but partly real. But it is with a complete, not partial, reality that the theatre deals; and in it the author's object is attained—even though it be merely to amuse—to just such extent as the piece which promotes it creates in performance the effect of that reality.

But, just as the incidents could not have been presented without a story of some sort as frame, so, without a milieu, the story itself could not have been imagined. Viewing with apparent seriousness the magical element in his subject, Mr. Gilbert made his piece a "fairy" piece and its atmosphere appropriately romantic. Thus the period became the Fifteenth Century, the father a King, the mother a Queen, the daughter's betrothed a Prince and so on. But the view which he took of the Palace of Truth itself was purely humorous. The confidences made therein are frivolous in nature and ludicrous in circumstance, and are recorded in the flippant and prosaic vein which would alone be suitable. The result is that in performance the piece in this respect receives injustice. For, as treated, the subject is in spirit utterly opposed to its environment, and at moments seems by contrast almost vulgar. In this the "fairy comedy" resembles The Lady of Leeds or any other "farcical romance"; and it becomes as much a source of wonder that Mr. Gilbert can be flippant in his mediæval fairyland as that Captain Marshall can be heartless in Venetian moonlight or "smart" among Scotch heather. Neither piece, of course, is sufficiently a reality in itself to have gained as a play from appropriate environment; but, had superficial reality been achieved, the effect of the subject would not have been disputed. The present performance, though creditable, is negative in quality—an error of judgment being atoned for by a lucky circumstance. A tendency on the part of the company to sacrifice the meaning of the remark actually made to the tone of the remark intended deprives the incidents of much of their possible effect; but the smallness of the stage makes it impossible to mount the scenes with any real illusion, and thus reduces the influence of the environment.

LYRIC THEATRE—MR. MARTIN HARVEY AS HAMLET

CERTAIN qualities Mr. Harvey's acting possesses which should have enabled him to present a more satisfactory picture than he succeeds in showing. He has a melancholy grace which has much attraction; and, for a term, that is present in his impersonation of the Prince of Denmark. For a brief hour—or rather quarter of an hour—in his opening scenes one feels this sad charm. After that good quarter of an hour, however, comes many a bad one, for Mr. Harvey's conception of the character, such as it is, is in its issue, a reversion to an antiquated tradition. He makes his Hamlet very mad, a brazen mouthpiece for wild and whirling words, full of sound and fury, and little else beside. He is an oratorical Hamlet, reciting somewhat incoherently the long soliloquies which he studied at Wittenberg. He is violently rhetorical and rhetorically violent. The humanity, the complexity, and the humour of Hamlet are never suggested in the storm of truculence and wordy wrath. Yet there is one scene in which Mr. Harvey is most interesting—that in which Hamlet mocks his uncle after the death of Polonius. The retention of this scene makes the action of the play more intelligible than usual on the stage; but the omission of the scene in which Hamlet halts irresolute before his uncle in prayer is a factor which makes for mystification. In such matters as mounting and dressing, the Lyric management has been very painstaking, and produces a real impression of barbaric splendour. The "humanised" ghost of Mr. Stephen Phillips proves a very tame spirit, with a truncated habit of elocution which is most inhuman and very irritating.

SIGNORA DUSE

SIGNORA DUSE is in London again, acting at the new Waldorf Theatre in Aldwych. We may have an opportunity later of dealing at length with the performance of this most wonderful actress, one of the few players who convince one, in the face of all theory, that acting can be a creative art. For the present we must content ourselves with offering her welcome.

FINE ART

MINOR EXHIBITIONS

MR. HOLMAN HUNT'S Lady of Shalott, now on view at Messrs. Tooth's galleries, would be a remarkable performance under any circumstances; but when we reflect that it is the work of a man of seventy-eight years, with a record of sixty years' magnificent performance, our admiration is touched with a sense of something almost miraculous. Since Titian and Franz Hals there have been many painters who, like them, produced masterpieces at the age of eighty, but we are always conscious of the fading eye, the palsied hand, and the inability to carry out a conception. Much of Watts' later work is touching, but it is so partly for this reason. Reverence for the man hushes our voices, and our attitude must be more or less deprecatory. But the Lady of Shalott stands in no need of apologetics. Not only is the drawing as unflinching as ever, the colour as daring, the finish as perfect, but we find in it a breadth of modelling, an appreciation of relative values that is quite new in Holman Hunt and that would do credit to the youngest recruit of the Royal Academy. The head of the girl, half-smiling, ashamed, the most beautiful head that Holman Hunt ever achieved, is relieved against the reflection of the sunlit landscape with amazing vigour and realism. The arms and hands are exquisitely modelled and are not, as in all Holman Hunt's previous work, especially in the Triumph of the Innocents, overmodelled.

It has been suggested in several quarters that this picture should be acquired for the nation. It would be a tardy recognition of a great man's powers, and if at the same time an early work like the wonderful Scapegoat could be added we might feel that a small portion of the debt that the nation owes has been paid.

If one were seeking a single word to mark the characteristic of Mr. Tonks' work at the Carfax Galleries, we should say that word was "charm."

The three mediums, oil, water-colour and pencil drawing are handled with unvarying taste and skill: Mr. Tonks seems incapable of a single ugly or clumsy touch. Such a high level of workmanship is only obtainable through the close study of the classics, and such study nearly always involves the suppression of the artist's own personality.

That personality is not lacking is proved by the capital Pearl Necklace, and in some of the water-colours, the Encampment, White Horse in Sunlight, or Blackberry-gatherers, but we are too often conscious of the incubus of De Wint and other precursors. The water-colour on a monochrome basis must be child's play to a painter of Mr. Tonks' accomplishment, but it should be left to smaller men who have not his keen eye for the true aspect of things. If Mr. Tonks would make more excursions into the unknown, we would guarantee his bringing home some fresh booty, at the cost, no doubt, of many absolute failures.

If Mr. Tonks errs at all it is in an excessive sensibility to the beauty of his material, but Mr. Maurice Greiffenhagen at the Dowdeswell Galleries is typical of the contrary error, a defiance of tradition and a curious love of the quaint and ugly.

He shows no appreciation of colour and atmosphere in his views of Naples and its environs, although even Naples has its own atmosphere, different, it is true, from that of England. He is at his best in works inspired by the Japanese colour-print, such as Boats of the Merghelina, and Fishing-stage, Santa Lucia; but in most of the other works which are characterised by an excessive use of Chinese white, the crudity of the colour and the vulgarity of the sentiment are hardly atoned for by undeniable cleverness. The life of Naples is something abounding, excessive, overwhelming; the noise, glitter and glare are intoxicating, but they are not to be conveyed to our visual sense by any such strident methods as those of Mr. Greiffenhagen.

Suggestion is necessary here, but the positive assertion of every detail is not only offensive but actually unnatural. There is something grimacing and mechanical in the arrested gestures which give no idea of the kaleidoscope of ever shifting life and movement.

Mr. W. L. Bruckman at the Galleries of Mr. Paterson shows himself a worthy compatriot of James Maris. Technically the influence of Maris and other modern Dutch masters is not entirely to the good, as certain brutalities of pigment are permitted which the old Dutch masters would never have condoned. But Mr. Bruckman's colour sense is so rare and refined, his composition occasionally so original and his artistic vision of such distinction that we are willing to hope that crudities will be eliminated in future work. As it is the lovely October and the charming Tulip-fields require no apology, nor the pastel of Motherhood with its delicate harmony of olive and warm grey. Mr. Bruckman has not confined himself to his own country, and his sympathetic and original views of Rye and Lewes are examples of fresh treatment of well-worn themes.

M. LALIQUE'S JEWELS

THERE have been some remarkably enthusiastic notices in the daily journals of the exhibition of M. René Lalique's wonderful jewels at Agnew's Gallery in Bond Street. To those who have followed his work during the last ten years it will be unnecessary to say how just, for once, is the general chorus of praise. Those who chance not to know how this artist can design and carry out the setting of a precious stone or the arrangement of any exquisite ornament have only to see his work to be entirely convinced of his mastery of the branch of art he has adopted and the unusual refinement and charm of his results.

As one passes down the finely decorated room in which M. Lalique's priceless jewels are shown, the eye is attracted by the most beautiful examples of goldsmith's work which have been given to the world since classic days, or at least since the masters of this art during the Renaissance.

But in the diadème, peigne, or pendant of this artist the spirit of antique loveliness is adjusted to the most modern feeling with a result that must delight all ages while beauty is truth, truth beauty. That M. Lalique was an accomplished sculptor and a painter with an excellent sense of colour before he devoted himself to the long neglected art of the goldsmith is known; but had it not been so his figures and arrangements of brilliants and other stones would show at once that a strongly personal artist was at work. Two large cases at Agnew's contain a collection of objects made by M. C. S. Gulbenkian, and here is shown some of the most alluring of the artist's work; but each and every case in the exhibition contains pieces of great charm, from a homely glass to a comb of carved fire-flies in horn and topaz, from the simple seal formed by a gold fish modelled with Japanese skill to the fine bijou devant de corsage in diamonds and amethyst.

To all artists and to all lovers of beautiful vanities—but vanities instinct with the spirit of romance—the Lalique exhibition will be a sure delight.

ART SALES

THE LOUIS HUTH SALE

THE sale of the collection of the late Mr. Louis Huth, one of three famous collector-brothers, which has recently taken place at Messrs. Christie's, is undoubtedly one of the most important of recent years. Mr. Louis Huth's collection of Old Nankin, China porcelain, and enamelled porcelain, egg-shell, Rhodian faience, Persian faience, Damascus faience, Old Imari porcelain, objects of art, Old English furniture, and pictures and drawings was large and choice, and the prices realised were very high. Among the china the most important lot of all was an oviform Old Nankin vase and cover, painted with branches of flowering prunus on marbled-blue ground, 10½ in. high; this, originally purchased for 30s. and bought (it is said) by Mr. Huth for £25, fell to Mr. Partridge at £5900. Other pieces to reach four figures were a set of three Old Nankin oviform vases and covers and a pair of beakers, £1550 (Larkin); a pair of beakers in Chinese enamelled porcelain, 12½ in. high, £2700 (Duveen); a pair of Mandarin jars and covers of Old Nankin, 42 in. high, 1850 gs. (Harding); and a pair of egg-shell lanterns of oviform shape, of Chinese enamel, 8½ in. high, £1200 (Duveen).

Of the pictures the collection was strongest in Gainsboroughs. A portrait of Monsieur Vestris, the dancer, ran to 4550 gs. (Wertheimer). A kit-cat of an elderly lady fetched 2900 gs. (Agnew); another portrait of an elderly lady, Mrs. Borroughs, 900 gs. A drawing in black and white chalk of the Duchess of Devonshire with her daughter reached 1000 gs. (Colnaghi).

A picture by Morland, called "Morning: or Higglers preparing for market," reached 2000 gs. (Agnew); and another Morland, "The Country Stable," ran to 1000 gs. (Agnew); and six others by the same artist fetched 3730 gs. between them. Reynolds, Hogarth and Lawrence were also represented, and fetched, on the whole, good prices. A beautiful Crome ran to 3000 gs. (Agnew), this being the highest price ever realised by a work of this artist. Constable's sketch for the "Salisbury Cathedral" in the South Kensington Museum ran to 1700 gs. (Colnaghi); a J. F. Lewis, "The Commentator on the Koran," 1560 gs. (Agnew); while two Corots fetched 2650 gs. and 2000 gs. respectively (Arnold and Tripp).

The result of the five days' sale was £117,943 6s. 6d.

Next month Messrs. George Trollope and Sons will sell by auction, on the premises, the whole of the contents (the property of the late Dowager Duchess of Abercorn) of Coates Castle, Fittleworth, Sussex, including the well-known collection of porcelain, old prints, mezzotints and engravings.

ASSOCIATED SENSATIONS

AN early passage in E's essay of last week raises a question so interesting that he will pardon me, I hope, for enlarging upon it.

My colleague has shown that the great master of "Clang-tint" was a lover of colour; and reminds us of the blind man to whom scarlet suggested the "sound of trumpets." The subject raised by these facts is known to the psychologist as "associated sensation," and it is very probable that a discussion of it may be of personal interest to some readers.

The present writer is devoted to music and spends most of his leisure in making and listening to it; but his appreciation of colour is small, and his "taste" in such matters not only untrustworthy, but, as he fears, incapable of much education. He is inclined to correlate this fact with the further fact that he has no personal experience whatever of "associated sensation." Let us now define this term.

By the "association of sensations" the psychologist indicates the well-established phenomenon that certain sounds, for instance, arouse, in many persons, what is most loosely termed a "subjective sensation" of light. This phenomenon must be distinguished from the (undoubtedly allied) power of a scent or a tune to evoke certain memories. In cases of associated sensation, the sound of violins arouses, perhaps, an impression of crimson. This is the commonest type of associated sensation—the arousing of visual by auditory sensation—and, as far as I can discover, is by no means uncommon amongst musical people. Judging by my own case, I would tentatively suggest that it is more likely to occur in people who have a "feeling" both for music and for colour. Much rarer are the cases where colours evoke hallucinations of sound; but even rarer combinations are recorded, as of hallucinations of smell and of taste aroused by colour or sound, and even vice versa. Many of the cases seem incredible: but it must certainly be accepted that the association of sensations is a fact and not merely a poetical figure of speech. Most frequently the association is inconstant: but there are cases in which it is invariably aroused. I am unable to say whether there is any constancy in the relation, e.g., whether the violin arouses an impression of crimson, say, whenever it arouses any, or whether it arouses crimson in one case and purple in another. If any reader can direct me to detailed observations on the matter, he has my thanks.

Certain tentative generalisations may, however, be based upon the few data at my disposal. In the first place, it may be noted—confining ourselves to the sound-colour association—that it is usually observed, as might be expected, in those who are especially sensitive to and appreciative of such stimuli. It is from "musical" people that one expects to hear accounts of this association. I should be grateful if E. would tell me, if he can, whether Wagner experienced it. So far, the inference is in favour of associated sensation as a privilege of those in whom the senses are highly developed.

But my use of the word hallucination—for such aroused sensations are plainly hallucinations—will prepare the reader to believe that the most striking instances of associated sensations are furnished by the records of the alienists. It is amongst the insane or mentally unstable that we find, as a rule, those cases where the association is invariable and obtrusive, whereas in the cases one meets amongst one's friends, it is occasional, and the aroused sensation is usually very faint. In cases recalled by the alienist, the subject is sometimes almost uncertain which is the aroused and which the arousing sensation. From these considerations, then, the inference would be that association of sensations is morbid, or at any rate, abnormal. Here, it is plain, we impinge upon the question as to the relation between insanity, with the states of exalted sensation met therein, and genius, which also is distinguished, in its æsthetic forms, as in certain poets and musicians, by a heightening of the sensory faculties. Plainly we cannot declare, offhand, that the association of sensations is "good" or "bad."

Needless to say, we cannot omit the evolutionary idea in considering this question. If it be true that all the senses have a common origin, we may be inclined to think that the evoking of colour-sensation by a trombone is a reversion,—evidence of the incompleteness of that "segregation" and "integration" which evolution should establish. It may be said—and he who has never experienced an associated sensation is naturally inclined to this opinion—that one ought not to confuse one sense with another, that so to do is to revert to the more primitive stage in which the senses were yet undifferentiated. This contention must further be criticised; but ere I do so, it is necessary to note an allied phenomenon, the relation of which to "associated sensation" proper offers a problem of too much subtlety to be now discussed. This, by way of emphasising the distinction, we may call the confusion of sensations.

In "associated sensation," as we have seen, one sensation due to an "objective stimulus," arouses another which we have termed an hallucination. You hear the violin and see crimson: the violin is there, but the source of crimson light is not. This, as I think, must be distinguished from the cases where the subject more or less definitely apprehends one external object by two senses. In Shelley's "Ode to a Skylark," for instance, we have the poet saying of the moon: "We hardly see, we feel that it is there:" and I could name certain chords, notably from Wagner's third period, which give me the impression of being palpable as well as audible; I hear and (very faintly) feel that they are there. Such semi-palpable chords are, in my case, uncommon and complex. Instances are the chord that opens the descending phrase at the climax of Isolde's "Liebestod," and also the wonderful resolution at the word "küß" in Schubert's setting of Marguerite's lament at the spinning-wheel. This phenomenon, which is doubtless not unknown to others, I myself attribute to a sort of sensory reversion: hearing and touch are both pressure senses, and when encountering a rare sound-complex my hearing and tactile sense apparently revert to their original fusion or undifferentiation.

Now let us return to the question whether we are to interpret the evidence of the asylums as indicating that true association of sensations—as distinguished from the confusion of sensations—is a retrogression and not an advance. In tentatively inclining to affirm that the evidence must not be so interpreted, and that, so long as the subject is not actually deluded, the association of sensations is a gift and not an infirmity, I would plead the admittedly dangerous argument from analogy. Evolution implies integration and segregation but it also implies increasing inter-relation between its products. Evolution means more than mere dispersion: the more various and distinct its products, the more certainly must they be correlated; else we have chaos and not cosmos. In the realm of mental action we find this inter-relation expressed as what we call the association of ideas—which is by no means the confusion of ideas. The characteristic of the intellectual forms of genius—such as mathematical genius—is the freedom, the variety, the completeness, the balance, the daring of the association of ideas. The analogical argument, then, is that associated sensation—not confused sensation, as when I half-feel a Wagnerian chord—may bear to the æsthetic forms of genius some relation more or less parallel to that which the association of ideas bears to philosophic genius. In your Newton one idea suggests another—his mind leaps from a falling apple to a falling moon; in your poet of sense, as Keats, a rare visual sensation suggests an auditory image, in your Wagner, a rare chord a blaze of colour, and so forth.

In described cases of associated sensation the aroused sensation is actually felt: whereas in the man who thinks of a sunset when he hears Chopin, there is no delusion that he is seeing the sunset. I admit the distinction: but is not the process essentially the same, though the aroused image is vivid in the one case and faint in the other? On these grounds, notably in remembrance of the characteristic so noteworthy in the poets—the describing of the experience of one sense in terms of another, I am inclined to regard association of sensations, provided that the discrimination of the subject is preserved—provided that, to use terms precisely, the hallucination does not become a delusion—as a gift rather than an infirmity. But I very much doubt whether the majority of alienists would be inclined to endorse this opinion.

MUSIC

HANDEL'S POPULARITY IN ENGLAND

EVERY one who is at all interested in the story of musical development, knows something of the strange pathos of Handel's career. It is a pathos very much its own; far different from the proverbial sadness of the prophet's life. The great man persecuted, perhaps martyred, like Socrates or St. Paul, for his devotion to his ideal, who is simply before his time, is sure to receive sympathy and eventual canonisation in the hearts of future generations when his time arrives. The spectacle of the merely neglected genius, obscure or in actual want during life, extolled after death, has been before the world ever since convention and fashion infused their harmful influence into people's taste in literature and art. Handel had his struggles, his fights with fashion and prejudice, but the pathos of his life lies not so much in these difficulties as in the fact that he made terms with his enemies; he was determined to claim their submission, to be successful with the public of his day, and he did so through a compromise which damaged his own ideal, and so killed a great deal of his work which should have been alive to-day. It is probably one of the strongest testimonies to the strength of his genius that he could effect any kind of compromise and not fall hopelessly. A lesser composer need aim far above his grasp to attain to any worth, but in Handel we have an instance of a man fixing on an ideal below what he could attain to, and yet remaining one of the really great, the elect of the earth.

He achieved what he set himself to do; he got hold of the public ear before the end of his life, and in the next generation his popularity reached its height and its expression appears to us as extravagant as it is pompous and sententious. I have in my possession a souvenir of the great Handel commemoration which took place in Westminster Abbey in May and June 1784. It is a substantial quarto volume, bound in calf, written by Dr. Charles Burney. It opens with a fulsome dedication to King George III., who was pleased to bestow his gracious patronage upon the festival, and to descend "into the regions of general life" and to countenance "common pursuits" and "amusements" therein. But this Hanoverian folly disposed of, the writer proceeds to more interesting matter and describes in great detail all the arrangements for the festival. He enlarges upon the magnificence of the enterprise, the immense size of the "band" (a term which includes both orchestra and chorus), the extraordinary skill of the famous Joah Bates in conducting; he gives precise details of the numbers and names of the performers, plans and engravings to show their exact arrangement and position both in the Abbey and in the Pantheon, in which the secular performances took place, and adds long and very eulogistic criticisms of each performance. But the main point to be noticed is not the good Doctor's enthusiasm about the festival, which was evidently one of the great events of his life, but his unquestioning acceptance of every note of Handel's music and the widespread knowledge which the public of his day seem to have had of works which are now only known to a few, or revived at intervals in the minds of the many by rare performances. To Englishmen of that time Handel's was not only the latest word in music, it was the last word; the consummation of musical possibilities. They did not believe that anything else remained to be said in music. In a short essay on "The Character of Handel as a Composer" Dr. Burney compares him to a long list of composers Italian and English, including Carissimi, Alessandro Scarlatti, Gasparini and Marcello, and our own Tallis, Byrd and Purcell, and finds him superior to each in the points in which each excelled. He goes a step further and in his whole-hearted admiration declares that:

"In his masterly, and excellent organ-fugues, upon the most natural and pleasing subjects, he has surpassed Frescobaldi, and even Sebastian Bach, and others of his countrymen, the most renowned for abilities in this difficult and elaborate species of composition."

It is in this that we gain insight into the prejudiced point of view which underlay Dr. Burney's criticism, and that of English musicians of the period. Handel filled the whole horizon. No other composer possessed either by nature or cultivation the power to appeal to every instinct and feeling which dominated respectable England at this time; therefore it could be granted to no composer to excel in any one particular. It was not the fault of Dr. Charles Burney and his contemporaries that they did not know the

"St. Matthew Passion" as well as the "Messiah." It was their fault that, knowing Bach's organ fugues and Handel's organ fugues, they, so to speak, threw the "Messiah" into the balance with the fugues, and pronounced that Handel had beaten Bach on his own ground of organ music. The Doctor's defence of his favourite against the charge of plagiarism is again an amusing case of special pleading. He says:

"I know it has been said that Handel was not the original and immediate inventor of several species of Music for which his name has been celebrated; but with respect to ORIGINALITY, it is a term to which proper limits should be set, before it is applied to the productions of any artist. . . . All that the greatest and boldest musical inventor can do is to avail himself of the best effusions, combinations, and effects, of his predecessors, to arrange and apply them in a new manner; and to add, from his own source, whatever he can draw, that is grand, graceful, gay, pathetic, or, in any other way, pleasing. This Handel did, in a most ample and superior manner."

The naïveté of the expression is delightful. Handel's "most ample and superior manner" allowed him to take the work of his contemporaries and predecessors, wherever it was good enough to serve his turn, and to re-issue it with a barefaced confidence which would rival the music pirates of the present day; it allowed him to string together movements, loosely constructed in themselves, of little or no relevancy one with another, into pasticcio operas and oratorios, which suited the need of the moment but could not live as wholes. His "superior manner" (in other words, his fatal facility for writing) allowed him to ruin much of his work as work, so that, had his splendid genius not come to the rescue to inspire such moments as the finale to "Israel in Egypt" and most of the "Messiah," Handel's might by this time have become as dead a name as that of Alessandro Scarlatti with whom Burney compared him.

After such a period of adulation, it was but natural that a reaction should set in. Children despise too often the ideals which they have just outgrown. It is only when the first enthusiasm and almost necessary sequence, the belittling of a man's work is over that we can form a true and abiding estimate of its worth. Can it be that we have not yet got far enough off from Handel, who died a hundred and fifty years ago to know what is true and what false in his art? If so, it does but show the mighty proportions in which his art is conceived; in spite of its blemishes, its incidental failures, it is still too big for us, clever ones though we think ourselves, to arrive at a just conclusion of its merit. More than this, we may at any moment be called upon to listen to a new "Messiah." We live in times of such musical activity that any day a Handel may arrive upon the scene and demand our attention. And we shall rush to the concert-room, note-book in hand, to form opinions, and worst of all, to deliver them in authoritative black and white next morning. And we shall think it our duty to stand by these valuable opinions, or if we begin to understand the work a little better, to cover our retreat with such expressions as, "the work improves somewhat on acquaintance," or "it was heard to better advantage."

CORRESPONDENCE

SCIENCE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your correspondent, J. A. B., judges it "absurd" to study theological questions in a "scientific spirit."

John Henry Newman was, I am told, the greatest theologian of the nineteenth century. Dr. Barry thinks him to have had the greatest mind of that century. His "Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine" is, in the opinion of judges, the most important contribution to theology for many decades. The evolutionist, certainly, has no hesitation in accepting this opinion. In the "Advertisement to the First Edition" of this work Newman excuses his "positive" tone on the ground of the "scientific character of the work." It is singular to find this "absurdity" in a theologian so belauded, but presumably J. A. B. would dispose of Newman with Carlyle's opinion that he had "the brain of a medium-sized rabbit," as he disposes of Wordsworth with Macaulay's opinion: to which he might have added Dickens's verdict that Wordsworth was a "dreadful old ass."

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—“J. A. B.” in his last letter is wise in restricting the scope of his gravamen to the tendency of men of science in general to overstep their proper bounds. But his previous letter contained a minor premiss which is now quietly dropped, and very properly so. It was that Dr. Saleeby was in his ACADEMY articles a typical offender. As one who has followed them closely from the first, I beg leave to set impression against impression, and to say that I for one appreciated them the more because they were free from that very cocksureness and specialising narrowness which “J. A. B.” seems to have detected.

ART AND MORALITY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Your columns have always proved so hospitable to me that I am tempted to encroach on them again. It would be infinitely comforting could we accept unquestioningly Dr. Saleeby's theories of the relation between Art and Morality.

But, Sir, at present I think the difficulties insuperable. Take, for instance, such a work as the “Hippolytus” of Euripides. What is the obvious teaching of the play? Hippolytus is ruined; Phaedra ruined; the only person, in fact, who issues triumphant is Aphrodite. Yet who shall dare to follow out logically Dr. Saleeby's teaching, and describe that play as false Art?

May 18.

D. DAVIES.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I shall await with much joyful patience the fulfilment of Dr. Saleeby's promise to skip from his scientific column and do duty in the Artistic.

He has brought me panting to the verge of an exposition of “art for art's sake”; he has then hedged behind a parenthesis—(“with the separate question whether the artist should have moral questions in his mind's eye as he works, I am not here concerned”)—and then he throws me a far-fetched generalisation with which to stop my mouth: words, words.

It seems to me that the question of his parenthesis is indeed the whole question. And I believe that all artists will consider it so. Dr. Saleeby follows his brackets with a reference to Wagner's music-dramas and to Everyman, quoting these in support of the contention that creative art and morality are related. But what has become of the separateness of the question in this short time? Granting as much moral purport as Dr. Saleeby likes in Wagner, and even in Elgar, where it is much more convincingly felt, and even again in Hogarth, who is admittedly an actual sermoniser, yet it is impossible to regard this quality as anything more than mere subject-matter: that is, when viewed from the standpoint of art, per se.

A man may have whatever he likes in his mind's eye, questions moral or immoral, and yet may be a consummate artist. Our burglars and murderers often are consummate artists.

Giving the question its utmost connotation and speaking of painters only for the moment, we may safely call art an appetite and nothing more. Painters of the true sort “study what they affect.” They love colour for colour's sake, grace and form and tone and light and suggestion each for its own sake—in short, art for art's sake. What they may have in their mind's eye during the satisfaction of this complex appetite they use as a peg on which to hang their indulgences. When a man with such appetites happens also to have a bent for the propagation of ethics, he produces some such works as those of Watts, or such as Ruskin would have produced if he could. But this moral quality is extraneous.

If the solution of this muddle is “All things are One” (writ large), or this: “If art be true, it is a part of Truth and related to other parts of Truth, such as morality,” then I say search for a solution was unnecessary, for to get so high and so distant is to fly from all obligation, and possibly on Icarus' wings.

THE BOOKSHELF

Spring in a Shropshire Abbey, by Lady C. Milnes Gaskell. With 18 illustrations. Smith, Elder, 9s. net.—Lady C. Milnes Gaskell is one of the many persons now writing books who would, fifty years ago, have put everything they wanted to say into long intimate letters which would have been the delight of their acquaintance; and had the book been in the form of old letters, carefully edited, it would have been very pleasant to us. But now, when luckily there is no such thing as the dignity of literature, and unluckily no commonly admitted distinction between a book and a collection of remarks, it is inevitable that Lady Gaskell, a woman of much reading and joy in reading, with a love and knowledge of many forms of rural life, who has seen what poor things are called books and praised, should herself write books. We remember her "Shropshire Tales." There was no art in them; and it must be confessed that that seemed due not to incapacity, but to a habit of mind so unsophisticated that she had never seen that there was such a thing as an art of arrangement, omission, expression. But the book was charming. One may even think that the very lack of literary skill gave to the record of Shropshire life and folk-lore a special charm; for it came near to being a kindly revelation of an agreeable and little-known people by one of them. Her "Spring in a Shropshire Abbey" is of exactly the same kind. It deals with Lady Gaskell, Wenlock Abbey, the household, the neighbours, the country round, during the months from January to July. It is very rich in folk-lore, in dialect, and in local character; nor does it overlap her other book. Her gardener is true and delightful, with such sayings as: "Fresh land, no manure, and a dusty summer, and tatters will take care of themselves; but come a wet year, a field potato is worth two in a garden, although I say it as shouldn't, but truth is truth, although you have to look up a black chimney to find it, as folks say"; and: "They have County Councils now, and new tricks of all sorts, but 'tis a pity as so many get up so early to misinform themselves..." Whether the author has taken down her rural tales, e.g., one of a witch and "over-looking," verbatim or not, she represents the rural manner well. There are some old verses, too, full of mystery and rhythm and cheerfulness. And there is a little girl who, after hearing "Sister Helen" read, makes a wax image of a governess and sticks pins in it, and prays that she may die, and says several wise things. Add to these, much slow talk of old books, of herbs and gardens, and much quotation, and readers who have time will see that here is a book that has the same charm as many an inconspicuous person of great character who succeeds only in being loved.

Verse and Worse, by Harry Graham ("Col. D. Streamer") (Arnold, 3s. 6d. net). On the appearance of "Ruthless Rhymes" the Scotsman very properly remarked: "It is difficult to see the humour of

"Philip foozling with his cleek
Drove his ball through Helen's cheek;
Sad they bore her corpse away:
Seven up and six to play."

Only very serious people are able to be really silly; the Scotch are as a nation too flippant and lighthearted to reach the sublime heights of the ridiculous; they have not the perspicacity of Aunt Jane who observed the second time she tumbled off a 'bus that the step is short from the sublime to the ridiculous. Too much common sense is fatal to the true appreciation of inestimable nonsense. Silliness tickles, as fingers do, running lightly over the ribs; and we laugh uproariously without heeding the questions of the man who is not ticklish. Mr. Graham's book contains much that has that inexplicable effect upon the reader, and the rollicking spontaneity of the verse gives the delightful impression that he enjoyed writing it as much as we enjoyed reading it; there is vitality in his rhythm, and his rhymes come pat and pointed, and as little laboured as the stream of fun that pours from him so naturally and so irresistibly. When we read in the Afterword of the author the two last lines, so full of promise,

"And while he has the strength to write 'em Will do so still—ad infinitum"

we greet his intention with a cheer, as spontaneous as the cheer of the guinea-pig in the immortal Alice.

The Wild Marquis: The Life and Adventures of Armand Guerry de Maubreuil, Marquis d'Orvault. By Ernest A. Vizetelly. (Chatto and Windus, 6s.). Mr. Vizetelly has added another to his former excursions in the byways of historical biography. M. de Maubreuil, though he is now almost forgotten, was concerned in many extraordinary adventures, and Mr. Vizetelly has certainly done justice to the dramatic interest of his career. More than that; he has devoted much industry to the historical "setting" of that career, and the result is a book of more than passing interest. In fact, Mr. Vizetelly has brought to his task the methods of the practised novelist, and not the least successful passages in his book are those in which he boldly reconstructs scenes and conversations of moment out of the historical materials available. De Maubreuil was a well-born adventurer, whose exploits in love and war, speculations, plots, imprisonments, wild escapades, and intimate association with famous personages of the Napoleonic and the Restoration periods, made his name famous for years all over Europe. Having been ruined by Napoleon over an army contract, he was incited to murder the Emperor, to kidnap the little King of Rome, and to put both Jerome and Joseph Bonaparte out of the way. It seems clear that Talleyrand at least acquiesced in this conspiracy, though Mr. Vizetelly is convinced of his full complicity. It was in order to call attention to his grievances that he slapped Talleyrand on the face in presence of the Court, and that incident with all its consequences does not lose in the telling by Mr. Vizetelly. Before that there is the extraordinary story of how de Maubreuil stole the jewels of Queen Catherine of Würtemberg. It is possible, as Mr. Vizetelly shows, that about thirty thousand pounds' worth of the jewels may still be lying at the bottom of the Seine. Altogether it is an entertaining book, and is none the worse for being neither an historical biography of the regulation pattern, nor an historical novel, but something between the two.

Puclias's Voyages. (MacLehose and Sons, Glasgow. Volumes III. and IV. 12s. 6d. each net.) Messrs. MacLehose issue, with commendable promptitude, the third and fourth volumes of their excellent edition of the "Pilgrimes." In the earlier portion of the work we found Master Purchas largely speaking for himself: he now departs modestly into the background, but we remain always conscious of his presence. He is the benign Wesley of early travel, regarding the world as his parish. These two volumes are worthy of his assiduity. There is a spirit of the wholesome, natural man pervading stories which men like Nicholas Downton, Sir Henry Middleton, Anthony Hippon, and the rest have to tell; the words they speak breathe a sturdy masculinity, full of force. These adventurers encountered a variety of hardships and dangers, in virtue of which they were almost entitled to assert their own code of morals and of honour. This, at any rate, they did: and so their narratives make racy reading. The lighter side is not often wanting. "I pray you pardon me for writing such fripperies," observes Richard Cock—a gentleman with the spelling of whose name a good many liberties are taken. But as the "fripperies" are full of human nature, they are the very justification of the book, and will go far to lighten the task which lies before those who have made up their minds to follow these ancient travellers to the end. That end is not yet in sight: we are promised twenty volumes. We shall find a welcome for them all.

ROMANCES FROM WAGNER'S OPERAS.

It is a remarkable thing how ignorant even genuinely musical people are of the plots of their favourite operas. Ask any of your Wagner-loving friends to tell you the story of "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," not to speak of the "Ring," and probably not more than one in fifty will be able to tell you the details of the plots of these operas, even when they are familiar with every note of the music. Hence the raison d'être of these works, which are novelised versions of Wagner's grand plots, and of permanent value to English literature.Handsomely bound in art linen, blocked in silver and gold. Large post 8vo, illustrated, 6s.

Roses for English Gardens.

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY,
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Daily Chronicle.—"All the roses of England, blossoming in a counterfeit summer of black and white, seem to be gathered together into Miss JEKYLL's charming book. The pictures are really pleasant to look at; near or far, a rose photographs quite as well as a beautiful face, and carries with it its own individual look. No one can fail to be captured by Miss JEKYLL's enthusiasm and fine discrimination."

Lilies for English Gardens.

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"LILIES FOR ENGLISH GARDENS" is a volume in the 'Country Life' Library, and it is almost sufficiently high commendation to say that the book is worthy of the journal. Miss JEKYLL's aim has been to write and compile a book on Lilies which shall tell amateurs, in the plainest and simplest possible way, how most easily and successfully to grow the Lily—which, considering its great beauty, is not grown nearly so much as might be expected. We certainly think that in the future there will be less neglect of this flower, for after looking at some of the illustrations (all admirable and admirably produced), there will not be many garden owners who will be content to be Lilyless."

Wall and Water Gardens.

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."

Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations. Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

Times.—"WALL AND WATER GARDENS."—He who will consent to follow Miss JEKYLL aright will find that under her guidance the old walls, the stone steps, the rockeries, the ponds or streamlets of his garden will presently blossom with all kinds of flowers undreamed of, and become marvels of varied foliage. More than a hundred photographs help to enforce Miss JEKYLL's admirable lessons."

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations. 21s. net.

Times.—"No department of gardening is neglected, and the illustrations of famous and beautiful gardens and of the many winsome achievements of the gardener's art are so numerous and attractive as to make the veriest cockney yearn to turn gardener."

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.

So great has been the success of this gardening book for beginners, that a third edition has been called for and is now ready. This work is for those who are about to begin gardening, nothing that will help the beginner over first difficulties being omitted.

About 100 diagrams will explain certain practical operations better than mere descriptions. There are also nearly 200 illustrations, prepared in the best style, of flowers, fruit, vegetables, and trees and shrubs.

Spectator.—"Full of information about both the useful and the ornamental, and as far as we have been able to test it, eminently practical. The beginner, by the way, will have gone a long way before he has assimilated the contents of this stout volume of nearly five hundred pages; but then alias cura, and the wider choice that is offered by a volume of this kind the better."

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens.

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Gardener's Chronicle.—"A good book on trees and shrubs is a real want. Few books are more often inquired for, and until now we have had a difficulty in replying to our correspondents who have asked for information on the point. In these days of trashy gardening books, it is a pleasure to come across one which bears the stamp of original observation, judicious inference, and industrious research."

THE LITERARY WEEK

THAT the modern, or as he himself would say, up-to-date journalist is something of a plague in the land would probably not be denied by the members of the fraternity themselves, because they are nothing if not cynically frank. But it would be very interesting to inquire how much the standard of literature has been lowered by recent developments in journalism. There was a time when evening papers in London were edited by men of letters and addressed to the most cultivated intelligences in the country, and we are glad to say that some at least of our contemporaries keep up that wholesome tradition; but, alas! there are many who ignore it absolutely. To take up some of the baser sort of evening papers is to see a mere collection of the day's garbage, and if we ascend a little in the scale there is still a hunt for popularity which is evidently considered as good a cloak for a multitude of sins as charity itself. These reflections came into our mind after a hasty perusal of the Memoirs of one who was really one of the most reputable representatives of modern journalism. He represented it at its very best and, therefore, in drawing some inferences from the work he has left behind, there is no desire whatever to depreciate the author or his work. Born in better times, Mr. Laurence Hutton would have done credit to the profession of letters.

As it is, he has left behind him, among other things, a volume of gossip which has been named "Talks in a Library," and we do not read far in it without learning something of the new standards brought into play. Here is a characterisation of the styles of men who used to be thought good writers, which seems to disclose the attitude towards literature of the modern pressman:

"The short jerky style of Hugo; the confidential, colloquial, 'that-reminds-me' style of Thackeray; the 'shiver-my-timbers' style of the author of 'Peter Simple'; the 'Lord-keep-my-memory-green' style of Dickens; or even the 'proverbial-philosophical-a-babe-in-the-house-is-a-well-spring-of-pleasure' style of Tupper, and the 'civilised-man-cannot-live-without-cooks' style of Owen Meredith, both of which last, by the way, the young ladies from the interior of the State admired particularly."

This requires very little comment. A man who can describe Thackeray's style as a mere "That reminds me," has for ever fixed his own value as a commentator. It would be interesting to know something affirmative after this negation.

Mr. Hutton's attitude to Sir Walter Scott is, "no one but the antiquary in literature cares now for 'Waverley' or 'Rob Roy.'" Yet singularly enough he contributes to the great wizard's ana an anecdote that lovers of Scott will read with a kind of sorrowful pleasure. It appears that among Dr. William H. Taylor's congregation in New York Scott's private coachman spent the last of his days, and he used to tell this story of the great romancer:

"About half-way on that sad last journey they came to the top of a certain little hill where Scott had been in the habit of stopping for a time to glory in the view of the lands he loved: on one side of him his present home; on the other side the home that was to be his until eternity began. Here, on the day of the funeral, the horses halted of their own accord, and no persuasion would induce them to move forward until the customary five minutes had passed.

"'And so,' said the faithful henchman, 'the "Shirra" was able to look around him once again!'"

Lovers of Scott cannot fail to be interested in this anecdote even when it is retailed by one who is entirely unsympathetic, but if any distaste is felt as to the literary preferences of Mr. Hutton it will be mitigated by the explanation of what his life was as a publisher's reader:

"whose lot in life," he says, "is not always a particularly happy one. At a salary ranging from fifteen to twenty-five dollars a week, he is expected to examine into the worth or the worthlessness of from three to six examples of literary manufacture a day; the amount of his wages depending upon the quality of his examples; the number of his examples depending upon their length. He must know what the publisher wants, which is what the public wants; for the publishers, no matter how much they may like it themselves, cannot afford to put upon the markets, at considerable cost of production, any article which is not likely to sell."

We are saved the trouble of summarising our views of what Thomas Carlyle would inevitably have called "a literary dud" by coming upon the following quotation:

"While I fail somehow in my appreciation of Fitz-Gerald's great work, which is in spots sometimes beyond my comprehension, I have a great respect for the man. This book-plate of his with its autograph endorsement, and an etching of a drawing of Fitz-Gerald, in his old age, by Charles Kean, I would rather possess, almost, than the original manuscript of 'Omar Khayyam' itself.

"A literary curiosity that I have is the card of autographs that was sent to me with a new hat."

Here then is the up-to-date journalist painted by himself. He is oblivious of all that is really great in literature and if he mentions those who have added to our few immortal books it is only to scoff and scorn them; but he is devoted to collection of autographs, the masks of dead celebrities and other things of that kind. He is also extremely proud of all the notice he has received from fourth- and fifth-rate men of letters, and is very careful to print their correspondence; but to what constitutes real literature he is blind and deaf. Is it any wonder that incidents like the one now to be described not infrequently take place?

"Joaquin Miller was an American of whom I saw much in London. He tells this characteristic story of Swinburne. Swinburne is very susceptible to boredom, it seems, and suffers a good deal of it at the hands of inquisitive strangers who intrude upon him out of mere idle curiosity and take up a good deal of his time, giving nothing in return. One of this kind of bores, an American and friend of Miller, was anxious to be taken to Swinburne's house. Miller was under obligation to Mr. Lion-hunter, and did not like to refuse him. He knew Swinburne's peculiarities, and dreaded the result; still he went and sent his card to Mr. Swinburne—'Joaquin Miller and Friend.' After a little delay the maid-servant returned, but in such evident confusion that Miller knew at once matters were not smooth upstairs, and that she had a message she did not like to deliver. This, with some persuasion, he got out of her, and it was to the effect that Mr. Swinburne would be very glad to see Mr. Miller, but his 'friend' might go to hell!"

Never was such a year as this for anniversaries, bi-, tri- and quater-centenaries, and so forth. We become bewildered, and, to tell the truth, a little bored with them. Norwich, where Sir Thomas Browne was not born, is putting up a bust of the author of the "Religio Medici" to commemorate the fourth centenary of his birth, which took place in London on October 19, 1605. Still, Norwich has every right to the chief honours of the writer who founded a school of English prose, and lived quietly writing, gathering knowledge and practising his profession in the parish of St. Peter Mancroft, while England was plunged into turmoil and revolution. His position in English literature we hope to examine at a future date. For the present we would only remark that sufficient attention has not been paid to his letters. The Browne correspondence in the British Museum is full of interest, not all of which appears in Wilkins' edition of the Letters. It reveals in the good doctor a great deal of sly and very human fun, besides an insatiable thirst for knowledge, and keen affections for his son Edward, himself a voluminous letter-writer, who afterwards attained distinction in his father's profession in London.

John Harvard, whose memory has lately been revived at Southwark, did not actually found Harvard University, but he left half his fortune to the infant college. His little collection of two hundred and sixty volumes, in which Puritan theology was better represented than the classics, formed the nucleus of the original library, which unhappily was destroyed by fire. The present fine library was enriched from time to time by Longfellow, who was Professor of Belles Lettres at Harvard, and it also contains more than four hundred books on Cromwell and Frederick the Great, left to it by Thomas Carlyle. It has over two thousand works relating to Dante, and its collection of folklore and mediæval romances is supposed to be the largest in the world. But perhaps John Harvard did something more than merely endow a college. His mother, who was born at Stratford-on-Avon, may have been acquainted with Shakespeare, who, when he was connected with The Globe, must have lived near Southwark, and her son may have been the first to make known Shakespeare's plays to his fellow colonists beyond the seas.

The following little poem is the authentic composition of an Arab, and was sent by a correspondent, who had discovered it, to the editor of the Woodbridge School Magazine, by whose permission we reproduce it.

"Ah! Ah! one day ago,
I did not see you, dear;
Alas! It was such long,
In her love, as one year.
"My eye, you are the cause,
That I am going to die;
I wish that you were shut,
When the beautiful passed by.
"My heart you are burning,
Your beloved you better meet;
My tears are not enough,
To put off all that heat.
"If I was not an Arabian Brave,
I shouldn't bear all this;
I should surely be killed,
If she doesn't save me by kiss."

In this year's issue of "Printers' Pie" several writers supply instances of printers' errors. Of these we like best a compositor's emendation of Guildenstern's "No, my lord, rather with choler," which reached Mr. Frankfort Moore in the proof as: "No, my lord, rather with cholera." "Printers' Pie" this year is larger than before; in fact, "this 'ere pie is a pie as is a pie, is this 'ere pie," as the page-boy said in the play. The drawings are excellent.

The French Academy will fill a vacancy on June 8. The candidates are MM. Maurice Barrès, Émile Bergerat, Jules Breton, George Lefenestre, and Étienne Lamy. In due course we hope to say what there is of interest to be said about the chosen candidate. In the meantime it is interesting to notice that the Academicians, in full conclave, have been awarding, as is their annual duty, a long list of literary prizes, some of them of quite considerable value; and the difference between the French and English methods of making such awards to meritorious writers is worth pausing to examine.

Our English idea of a prize is that somebody should prescribe a subject, and that there should be a competition. Strange as it may seem, it took quite a long time for the general body of English authors to realise that the Nobel Prize was not awarded in this way. We have ourselves seen letters addressed by authors to the Secretary of one of our leading literary societies, asking: What is the subject for the Nobel Prize this year? Is there any entrance fee? At what date should applications be sent in? Their warrant for putting the questions was that almost all our own literary prizes are academic in their origin, and are allotted in accordance with the time-honoured academic methods.

The French system is entirely different. The idea there is that every author should go on doing his own work in his own way, and that the Academicians, as the trustees of various prize funds, should reward merit—and even originality—when they see it. Poems, novels, short stories, plays, essays, histories, dictionaries—all kinds of books, if good in their respective kinds—may bring their authors unexpected windfalls of this sort, in accordance with the wills of founders and benefactors. This, of course, is one of the things that our own Royal Society of Literature ought to be doing, and might have been doing if it had not missed its opportunities and become such a hole-and-corner institution. Perhaps the British Academy, having more authority, and commanding more respect, might do it even now, if any millionaire offered it the trusteeship of some such fund as the Prix Vitet. The idea is at any rate worthy of the consideration of any millionaire of literary tastes.

We mentioned some time ago that Les Charmettes, the house in which Rousseau lived with Madame de Warens at Chambéry, had been purchased to be classed as a "public monument." It has long, however, been a place of literary pilgrimage, and has even had a visitor's book in which both eminent persons and other persons have recorded their impressions. The quatrain which Victor Hugo contributed has, indeed, been torn out by an autograph hunter; but the observations of other notabilities remain. "Rousseau, in beholding your dwelling-place I admire you more than in reading your books" is the cryptic exclamation of Louise Michel. "The cause of humanity, of youth, and of society in general was pleaded by Jean-Jacques, the most feeble of mankind," is the contribution of M. Maurice Barrès. M. Jules Claretie bursts out with lyric intensity: "Charmettes! Montmorency! The departure and the arrival! The evening and the morning! Here Rousseau found the poetry of hope; there he found the poetry of retrospect."

Perhaps, however, the visitors' book is most interesting when it becomes the receptacle for the contents of the overflowing cup of human fatuity. A military man deplores the establishment of a rifle-range "near the dwelling in which so beneficent a genius was sheltered." An unknown civilian opines that "in visiting the places inhabited by great men one feels that one becomes great oneself"—which seems a simple recipe for arriving at distinction. The moralists also assert themselves. Under the pseudonym "Algerienne" we find this significant question: "Jean-Jacques, what became of your children? Your genius was magnificent, but your conduct is unworthy of imitation." "Noyere, Deputy of French Guiana" informs us that he once knew a man who educated his son on the lines laid down in "Emile": "He made of him a blockhead and an imbecile."

Some visitors seem unwilling to write their names without appending the full list of their distinctions. One of them insists that he is "jeweller and gem-setter to the Emperor." Another, under the date of September 5, 1859, writes as follows:

"Pierre Millière, of Saint-Jean-de-Losne, formerly a pharmaceutical chemist and an ironmonger at Lyon, a naturalist, a painter, and a poet, secretary of the Linnean Society, corresponding member of the Society of British Artificial Manures, born July 28, 1802, passed Les Charmettes in the course of an insect-hunting expedition, and experienced adorable emotions."

Sometimes, however, human fatuity expresses itself in verse. This example, which we venture to render into English rhyme, is really admirable in its way :

"Admire my courage—it is bad to beat,
I walked up here in the midsummer heat.
Panting like seals, my friends approached the place.
I with an old bandanna mopped my face."

Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack have gained much success with their Shilling Scientific Series, some five or six volumes of which have now been published. They have just arranged with Dr. Saleeby for the writing of five more volumes, dealing respectively with Organic Evolution, Heredity, Psychology, Sociology, and Ethics. These little monographs are primarily intended for separate publication in the Series, but will be so written as also to permit of publication in the form of a continuous treatise.

The Playgoers' Club has accepted a request made by Mr. Philip Carr, the Director of the Mermaid Repertory Theatre, that the Club should choose a play, which has not yet been acted, for production by him during the present year. The conditions of the competition are that the play must not be less than three acts in length, and that it must be sent in under a pseudonym with the real name and address of the author in a sealed envelope addressed to the Hon. Secretary, Playgoers' Club, Clement's Inn, London, from whom intending competitors can obtain all information.

Herr Gerhart Hauptmann is one of the distinguished foreigners selected this year for the distinction of an Oxford honorary degree. Apart from his genius, the great tragedian is interesting on account of his versatility and his very unliterary origin. His father kept a hotel at Obersalzbrunn, a small watering-place in Silesia, but fell into financial difficulties when a change of fashion sent his customers to the more famous baths of Ems, Kissingen, and Baden-Baden. The boy, in consequence, received his early education at the village school, where he was accounted a dullard, though it was discerned that he had a certain talent for telling stories, and for German composition.

He intended to follow the profession of a sculptor; and though he was not considered a very satisfactory pupil at the Breslau Art School, where he was only remarkable for the irregularity of his attendance, he got so far as opening a studio at Rome. There, however, he fell ill, and returning to Germany was nursed back to health by Fräulein Thienemann, whom he shortly afterwards married. Gradually he took to writing.

His first work was a play entitled Das Erbe des Tiberius, composed under Roman influences, of which he lost the manuscript. Next followed an epic poem in the style of "Childe Harold," which was printed, but afterwards recalled and suppressed. Thirdly, he wrote miscellaneous poems; but the publisher who had accepted them failed before the day of publication. Fourthly, he began an autobiographical novel, on the lines of "David Copperfield"; which remains unfinished.

His first remarkable success was with a drama called Die Weber. This made a sensation because of the socialistic and anti-monarchical sentiments supposed to be contained in it. In several cities it was prohibited by the censor, and there were riots in consequence. The edict was in force even in Berlin for a short time, but was subsequently revoked, and Die Weber became one of the regular pieces in the répertoire of the Deutsches Theater. The success of the piece caused Herr Hauptmann to be accepted as the leader of the literary Radicals of his country; but more striking success was to follow with the production of Die versunkene Glocke—a work which, some time ago, was already in its fortieth edition.

LITERATURE

MR. BRANDES' NEW VOLUME

Main Currents in Nineteenth-Century Literature. By GEORGE BRANDES. Vol. IV., Naturalism in England. (Heinemann, 12s. net.)

ALL students who have the dignity of English literature at heart will be interested and impressed by Mr. Brandes' stimulating volume. To look at our own literature through the eyes of one who surveys it from without, from the standpoint of a foreign man of letters, is a useful and fruitful exercise, and produces a curious intellectual excitement. And this is especially the case when one sees it reflected in the mind of so sympathetic and earnest a critic as Mr. Brandes.

The first thing that strikes a reader, on completing the perusal of this solid and careful volume, is the point of view of the writer. Mr. Brandes seems to approach literature not wholly from the side of art, though it is, of course, unnecessary to say that his pages are full of delicate insight and fine perception. He is concerned rather with the moral and spiritual progress of the world; the message of poetry, according to his view, is of a prophetic rather than an artistic nature, and the greatness of a writer seems to him to depend, not so much upon the form and the expression as upon the enthusiasm and directness with which a poet has handled political and liberal ideas in the larger sense. This is, of course, a perfectly coherent and definite theory of poetry: it assigns to the poet a direct and noble relation to the thought of the age. But it seems to us to be only a partial view. In a sense, the work of all true poets has an effect in contributing to the cause of intellectual liberty, and to the dissemination of large and beneficent ideals; but it is possible to set a higher value than Mr. Brandes would do on the work of poets who aim at such thoughts only by implication. After all, it is not our business to contest Mr. Brandes' root-theory of poetry, but rather to indicate how far, in the volume before us, he establishes his case.

As one reads one becomes aware that the volume is rather a sympathetic interpretation of certain great figures, from Mr. Brandes' point of view, than a piece of masterly generalisation. The author takes poet after poet, and, with a skilful handling of biographical material and an ardent critical appreciation makes a rapid and interesting sketch of the motives and performances of the particular writer. But we feel that our author's theory of the poetical function is so distinct that while he does more than justice to certain great figures he does less than justice to certain more sober and conservative workers. His impatience, for instance, with the provincialism, the "thick-ankled" morality, the solemnity, of Wordsworth emerges in many places. Mr. Brandes has a sincere admiration for Wordsworth, presumably because Wordsworth was so deeply affected by the ideals of the French Revolution; but he does not enter sufficiently into the sober reflectiveness, the tranquil reveries, of that austere poet. Again, Southey, who for all his tiresome longwindedness, his childlike complacency, did uphold the dignity of literature, is dismissed from the scene with contempt and scorn. In the case of Coleridge, Mr. Brandes seems to set a higher value upon his metaphysical and political influence than upon the pure and fantastic beauty of his best work. In the case of Keats, he shows an ungrudging admiration for the poet's ardent perception of the inner beauty of the world, though he says that his writings prove nothing. Again, our critic puts an altogether extravagant value upon Moore, as a national poet; he assigns a disproportionate space to his biography, and fills much of it with an account, most vivid and stirring in itself, of the career of that pure-minded and high-hearted revolutionary, Robert Emmet. Moore was essentially a temporary poet, and such vogue as he enjoyed was mainly due to his touching with a liquid grace a certain not very potent vein of sentimentalism.

Again, it is strange to find a critic of such weight as Mr. Brandes unable to appreciate the charm of a poem like Landor's "Gebir." In spite of its inconsequence and singular flavour, it has a strange and glowing power of romanticism which places it, we consider, on altogether a higher plane than the brilliant Dialogues which Mr. Brandes praises so generously.

Mr. Brandes has a true appreciation of the wild and airy beauty of Shelley's work; but it may fairly be held that it is through this delicate and inimitable beauty that Shelley will continue to affect the world, and that his revolutionary theories, which amounted to little more than a desire for the destruction of the safeguards by which society is held together, have already died a natural death.

But it is in Byron that we draw near to the hero of Mr. Brandes' book, and, with certain qualifications, we may frankly admire the critic's enthusiastic treatment of his protagonist. His criticism of Byron does a very valuable thing—it initiates the reader into the secret which made Byron perhaps the only English poet of the century whose reputation was also European. To Englishmen who have escaped from the glamour that formerly surrounded the name of Byron, the poet's fame is disfigured by grave faults; by affectation, by gross debauchery, and by undeniable ill-breeding. The latter is perhaps the most serious fault of all, because Byron's ill-breeding was not a superficial fault but a real vice of temperament. Consciousness of superiority can be condoned, but not a consciousness of superiority based on vulgar claims. This is just the point that an English critic of Byron is able to see, and that a foreign critic of the poet is able to overlook. With Mr. Brandes it is evident that Byron's affectation is regarded as originality, his debauchery as impulsive recklessness, his vulgarity as splendid pride. The romantic setting, the glowing personality, and the intimate despair, which made Byron so potently attractive a figure for contemporary Englishmen, have still their undiluted value for the foreign critic. What has become outworn, rococo, even grotesque, to the modern Englishman in the figure of Byron—his savage pose, his unnecessary parade, his self-conscious cynicism—is still picturesque, adorable, desirable, to the foreigner. With us Byron triumphs by virtue of his sincerity and personality over his studied picturesqueness, his clamorous publicity. No one thinks of suspecting the reality of his sufferings and the bitterness of the cup he administered to himself; what one does suspect is his ardent desire to take the world into his confidence, his pride in stimulating curiosity and refusing to gratify it, his fondness for a cheap mystery. Mr. Brandes' tribute to the poet, whom he literally swallows whole, whose vices he condones, whose opponents he crushes with strenuous accusations of canting hypocrisy, has this supreme value, that it makes one beware of contemning, because it happens at the present moment to be unfashionable, a tone of feeling in Byron's poetical character which may be genuine and even admirable.

The book, then, has a high value for serious students of poetry; it teaches us not to form insular, saugrenu judgments; and quite apart from its main thesis, with which one may or may not agree, it is a mine of apposite biographical illustration, of delicate appreciation and of felicitous criticism of a high order.

JOHN KNOX

John Knox and the Reformation. By ANDREW LANG. (Longmans, 10s. 6d.)

MR. LANG, having attained distinction in many other fields, has now won a secure place among the historians; but he writes history after his own fashion and in his own style. He is not a master of exposition, and it is not without difficulty that we follow the elusive thread which he puts in our hand. He is, indeed, less a narrator than a critic. He takes it for granted that his readers are not ignorant of the facts, upon which he comments with a characteristic lightness of touch. Above all he is studiously moderate, not in his opinions, but in their expression. He knows that irony is a better weapon of controversy than violence, and irony he employs with admirable success and conviction. Even in exposing the enormities of John Knox he keeps his literary temper, and instead of breaking the Reformer's head with a bludgeon, gently pricks him with the pin-point of his scorn. Though irony enters into the very fabric of his work, and may be detected on every page, a few examples will make his method clear to all. When in 1556 a calf with two heads was born and shown as a warning to Mary of Guise, the idolatress sneered that "it was but a common thing." "Such a woman," comments Mr. Lang, "was incorrigible." Again, when Mr. Lang has set forth the infamous libels which Knox hurled at Mary of Guise, he says no more than that "these are unfortunately examples of Knox's Christianity." So, too, when Knox had fulminated and thundered against "the Roman Antichrist" in the presence of Mary Stuart, "if one wishes to convert a young princess," says Mr. Lang, "bred in the Catholic faith, it is not judicious to begin by abusing the Pope." Truly it is not; but "judicious" is the word which best expresses Mr. Lang's manner of writing history, and it is his peculiar triumph to have severely castigated the Reformer without displaying a violent hostility towards him.

It is a common superstition that time corrects intemperate views, and reveals the truth to those who would discover it. But it is a superstition only. If a man has the faculty of advertisement or intimidation, the value, which he and his friends put upon himself, is accepted faithfully by remote generations. Now, that old Anarch, John Knox, had a rough tongue, and a talent, conspicuous even in those rough days, of saying unpleasant things. He attacked kings and bishops with a pride of insolence, and yet nobody laid violent hands upon him. Once upon a time he preached before Edward VI., and with more courage than discretion violently insulted the king's ministers:

"What wonder is it, then," said he, "that a young and innocent king be deceived by crafty, covetous, wicked, and ungodly councillors? I am greatly afraid that Achitophel be councillor, that Judas bear the purse, and that Shebna be scribe, comptroller, and treasurer."

Yet the king and ministers listened and made no protest. For Knox had frightened them, and throughout his career the power of inspiring terror stood him in good stead. Years later, when Scotland was given over to assassination, nobody, as Mr. Lang points out, "ventured to put a dirk or a bullet" into Knox. It was not a moral scruple which prevented his enemies from dealing with Knox according to his own measure. The manifest truth is that, as Mr. Lang says, "nobody had the courage." And something of this exaggerated respect for Knox has survived ever since his death. In some way he seems to be bound up with the honour of Scotland, which has taken a strange pride in his insolence and stupidity, and the most of his biographers have found no word to say against him. But Mr. Lang has at last disengaged the truth, and, though he has done it with a gentle hand, we may henceforth contemplate Knox in his true shape and colour.

The worst sin that can be set down to Knox's account is that he was an Anarchist unashamed, who believed that the blood of all men who differed from him might most righteously be shed. No sooner had he found his tongue and a pulpit than with an almost Sadic rage he was clamouring for blood. And when he went prudently into exile he did not moderate his rage. In 1554, from the security of Dieppe, he appealed to assassins to murder Queen Mary and Philip of Spain:

"God, for his great mercy's sake," says he in his "Admonition," "stir up some Phineas, Helias, or Jehu, that the blood of abominable idolaters may pacify God's wrath, that it consume not the whole multitude. Amen."

And this was not the worst. In his maturer years he even dared to urge the faithful to a general massacre of their fellow subjects. After which the wrecking of St. Andrew's and other seats of learning seems a venial sin. But it was part and parcel of Knox's destructiveness. He seems to have taken a pleasure in pulling down, and we cannot applaud either his wisdom or his courage. His constant vituperation proves his folly, and it is very little to his credit that he published his "Admonition" when he was safe across the Channel, that he invited others to take risks which he avoided.

Like all Anarchists, Knox was stupid. He had no ambition of constructing or improving; he did not even guess at the effect of his exhortations; and by the violence of his language he materially injured his own cause.

"We can assure you," wrote some exiles for religion's sake to Calvin, "that that outrageous pamphlet of Knox's" [the "Admonition"] "added much oil to the flame of persecution in England. Before the publication of that book not one of our brethren had suffered death, but as soon as it came forth we doubt not but you are well aware of the number of excellent men who have perished in the flames."

Nor was Knox a theologian, as were Calvin and Bullinger, who perfectly well understood his limitations. He had a vast number of vituperative texts at his fingers' ends, which he jumbled up foolishly, and quoted, like the Devil, to his purpose. Least of all did he demand an equality of justice. There was nothing he hated so bitterly as he hated toleration. What he wanted was to plant his heel firmly and heavily upon the neck of the other party. And he arrogated to himself, in the phrase of Erastus, "the power of opening and shutting heaven to whomsoever he would." Whence he had this power he did not condescend to explain. If it came from God, as one of his opponents said, Knox should have proved his influence by a sign. If it was conferred by man, then he was not demonstrably better or stronger than his opponents. But Knox neither could nor would argue. Why should he, when a ready reference to idolatry, harlotry, and the Scarlet Woman served his turn? And so he persisted unto the end, declaiming without reason, and working off the weary commonplaces of theological vituperation with all the energy of an unscrupulous tongue. "His favourite adjectives," says Mr. Lang, "are 'bloody,' 'beastly,' 'rotten,' and 'stinking.'"

The least amiable trait in his character was the brutal insolence with which he treated women. As Mr. Lang wittily points out, he had in him the makings of a Society journalist. He was always avid of gossip, especially when it was discreditable to his enemies, and he dealt in scandal with as much zest as the miscreant who provides paragraphs for the Kitchen Gazette. Mary Livingstone, for instance, tell under his lash without any reason, and no one was found to flog him in revenge. His long and weary struggle with Mary Stuart is familiar to all, and it is to the glory of the woman and the queen that she worsted him in dignity and argument. But it was for Mary of Guise, the Regent, that he reserved the choicest flowers of his rhetoric. As a commencement, he declared that she only wanted her chance "to cut the throats of all those in whom she suspected the knowledge of God to be." Presently he compares her with "Egyptian midwives," with Nebuchadnezzar, and with Rahab the Harlot. Then his charges grow more precise. She is, says he, "a wanton widow," the mistress both of Cardinal Beaton and d'Oysel. That there was no word of truth in these charges Knox probably knew as well as another. But they suited his peculiar style of eloquence, and for him that was enough. What he was we have seen: a vulgar, fanatical, clamorous fellow without knowledge or policy. Mr. Lang excellently sums up what he did for Scotland:

"His influence lasted," he writes, "and the massacre of Dunavertie (1647), and the slaying of women in cold blood, months after the battle of Philiphaugh, and the 'rouping' of covenanted 'ravens' for the blood of cavaliers taken under quarter, are the direct result of Knox's intellectual error, of his appeals to Jehu, Phinehas, and so forth."

Not an amiable record, but, such as it is, it is John Knox's.

VERITATEM DILEXI

Ernest Renan. By WILLIAM BARRY. (Hodder & Stoughton, 3s. 6d.)

To entrust the biography of Renan to a Roman Catholic Doctor of Divinity looks like an ironical pleasantry on the part of the Editor of the Literary Lives Series. It produces a striking clash of views. The author of the book yields his devotion to the "Man of Sorrows"; it is an article of his faith that we are "conceived in sin and born in iniquity"; humility, self-distrust, and dissatisfaction with self are of the very essence of the Christian religion; the mournful note in the more poignant of Christian writings is the natural wickedness of man and the necessity for a Redeemer. What, then, could be more utterly opposed to the spirit of Christianity than Renan's summary of his life as "a charming promenade through the nineteenth century"? Moreover, the description is a perfectly accurate one. "I have never known grief," he said on a memorable occasion. Others have disclosed in secret diaries their illusions, their repentance, their mistakes; he has left it on record that gazing back from the vantage-point of old age he saw nothing to change in his charming promenade. This is a frame of mind more easily understood in France than in Great Britain. More or less the attitude of Renan was that of Voltaire and, much earlier, of Abelard. The philosophy is reflected in the prose of these men, clear, amusing, a little supercilious, elegant, a little cynical, never turbid, never disclosing the earnest depths of the Anglo-Saxon. Few things could be more instructive than to compare the internal struggles of a Newman, "the bitter perturbed death agony through long years" of a Carlyle, before the revolution in their early beliefs, with Renan's fastidiously elegant change. Dr. Barry not unfairly describes the mental process at St. Sulpice:

"He was mastering Hebrew and applying his new-found knowledge to the Bible-narratives, not in the least as an original student, but with ready acquiescence in the methods of his German text-books. Under that light the supernatural faded away; every form of Christian dogma perished; of religion itself nothing was left save some scattered moral elements, without transcendent source, or divine sanction, or scope beyond this world. The critic stood aloft on a heap of ruins. In the endeavour to find out why he believed, he had ceased to believe in anything."

Dr. Barry has written what is in many respects an excellent and most instructive biography, but he is somewhat too prone to argue with Renan's opinions without trying to "place" him amid the powerful influences of the nineteenth century. For it is idle to assume that he was the only or even the greatest critic of Christianity. At the very moment when he was discovering at St. Sulpice that his intellect was not satisfied with Roman Catholicism, historical criticism—its foundation laid by an English bishop, Dr. Lightfoot of Durham—was at work rendering untenable many of the old beliefs regarding the origin of Christianity. Science, through geology and biology, was substituting a well-reasoned hypothesis for the accepted account of man's beginning on this planet. Tentative efforts in the study of myth and folk-lore were demonstrating that rules of conduct which had been regarded as purely authoritative were really the slow growths of man's experience. It was the Zeitgeist, that invisible influence, which directed the subtle mind of Ernest Renan to fall into line with the other workers. Newman is Dr. Barry's hero, whom he constantly brings into contrast with Renan, as in the following piece of eloquence:

"Newman is a Mystic, Renan a Rationalist. To Newman his conscience makes known a present Deity; but to Renan it is a human invention without echo in the heights or the depths. The one enlarges on the 'ventures of faith'; by the other we are warned not to be the dupes of our better feelings. Prayer is the philosophy on which Newman feeds his mind; to Renan prayer has become absurd, for what is it more than talking to one's self? Reverence, adoration, shame and holy fear betoken that the one is face to face with a Supreme Judge, in whose kindness he revives, under whose frown he wastes away. The other sees no intellect superior to his own; reveres no divinity; suppresses the idea of sin; loses the delicacy of feeling which protects all exquisite virtue; and writes his page in the scandalous chronicle of French letters. With Newman learning, style, eloquence, are but means to a nobler end; he is always intent on religion, even where he comes down to a schoolmaster's exercises. But Renan, who began at the same starting-point, turns all this another way. The lowest knowledge is the only real truth; art loses its former interest; religion is a pretty make-believe, ethics a lottery, life itself an entertainment."

But all this is not so convincing as the author would seem to think. When Newman embraced Roman Catholicism, was it not because he thought it the lesser of two evils? He found a refuge in the Church, but we have yet to learn that he found there a resolution of his doubts. And argument on a matter of that kind is in vain. The world of culture and scholarship has given its verdict by moving away from the questions that perplexed thinkers like Newman and Renan in the middle of last century.

Apart from the controversial aspect, the life of Renan is more interesting than is that of the bookman usually. He was practically a peasant by birth, and in early life had the manners as well as the dogmatism of his class. But he certainly learned to be urbane—to be a flatterer, says Dr. Barry—as one who was for long a dependent. The affection of his sister, without whose hard-earned money his career would have been impossible, forms a delightful chapter in his life. It saved him from those sordid struggles with poverty that so often render the biography of a man of letters painful reading. He enjoyed life all the more because he did not take it seriously—"had not the genius for affirmation," as Madame Alphonse Daudet said. To him the world was merely a pageant and an object of curiosity as to whether the people in it passed their time in religious devotion, high art, wine, woman or song. The staggering drunkard and the ascetic priest were but figures in the show, and of equal importance if it be admitted that there is no good and no evil, but that all are passing alike to oblivion, "the grisly phantom sitting at the gate."

ANTIQUITIES MADE HERE

Archæology and False Antiquities. By ROBERT MUNRO. (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

MUCH in this volume will irresistibly remind the reader of the Kaim of Kinprunes with Monkbarns expatiating to young Lovel, and Edie Ochiltree exclaiming: "Pretorium here, Pretorium there, I mind the biggin o't." There is surely no end to the vanity and gullibility of the antiquary. Forgers have flourished in every age. Did not the clever Surtees deceive the good Sir Walter with the ballad the "Death of Featherstonhaugh" with notes and a learned explanation, and does it not still stand duly set out in the "Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border"? Time would fail us to recount all the fabrications of charters and family trees from mediæval times down to the pedigree furnished for the pompous Bristol alderman by the "marvellous boy." Probably one of the most remarkable of these chevaliers d'industrie was Edward Simpson, better known as "Flint Jack" and under other aliases, "Fossil Willy," "Old Antiquarian," "Cockney Bill," "Bones" and "Shirtless," all expressing but too plainly the habits of life and meatless and penniless condition of this wandering but expert fabricator of antiquities. The frontispiece of Dr. Munro's book is a beautiful illustration of specimens of "Flint Jack's" forgeries now in the Royal Scottish Museum, Edinburgh. He was a perfect genius in the art and Dr. Steven writes: "He had the coolness to tell the Professor that there were plenty of his things in the British Museum, and very good things too!" In fact he gloried in his ability to form counterfeits and appeared to think that his neat deceptions were to be received quite as clever matters of business. At the conclusion of a paper "On the Ancient Flint Implements of Yorkshire, and the Modern Fabrication of Similar Specimens," Jack was invited by the President (Mr. Pitt Rivers) to mount the platform and exhibit his work, which is thus described:

"He undid the knots of his red handkerchief, which proved full of fragments of flint. He turned them over and selected a piece, which he held, sometimes on his knee, sometimes in the palm of his hand, and gave it a few careless blows with what looked like a crooked nail. In a few minutes he had produced a small arrow-head which he handed to a gentleman near, and went on fabricating with a facility and rapidity which proved long practice. Soon he had collected round the forger, while his fragments of flint were converted into different varieties of arrow-heads and exchanged for pences among the audience."

Flint Jack visited Scotland and Ireland, but his Scottish tour was not a success, the people being, as he said, "too canny," and the journey hardly paid expenses. He was much gratified by his visit to the Emerald Isle, where "he left behind him many a fine Celt arrow-head hammer and spear!" He fabricated a Roman milestone and sent it to a doctor at Scarborough for £5. At Cambridge he drove a roaring trade in antiquities; "On his first visit to London during a whole year he found the demand for Celts and other flint implements fully up to the measure of his power to manufacture them."

Another producer of antiquities was one William Smith, alias "Skin and Grief" or "Snake Willy," whose centre of operations was the eastern coast of Yorkshire. The Great Causeway has long been a place for the sale of antiquities. Visitors from all parts, with a percentage of the Monkbarns clans, were ready purchasers; Dr. Munro writes: "This last autumn some of my Irish archaeological friends informed me that the industry of manufacturing stone implements still goes merrily on along the Anticline coast." One will be chary of indulging one's historical or archaeological bent in admiring antiquities even in the most exclusive and select storehouses and museums unless they are vouched for fully with a history beyond dispute. Egypt and the Holy Land do a large and flourishing business in "anticos," and how many travellers with more cash than discretion have carried home priceless relics carelessly manufactured to order by some expert Copt or Armenian! We cannot enter into the battle-royal of the "Clyde controversy" on the supposed crannogs. Here is an account of the find from Professor Boyd Dawkins:

"The collection is as a whole unique, and unlike any collection from any other archaeological site in Europe. Four oyster-shells from Dunbuie particularly attracted my attention. Two worn shells belong to the common British oyster, and demand no further notice. The fresh shells have the characteristic purple muscular impression of the American oyster and are unmistakable Blue Points. All have one or more holes drilled in them. If these belong, as is alleged, to the site of the Dunbuie hill-fort, it is obvious that the inhabitants are the Americans, and that the importation of American oysters to the banks of the Clyde began before the discovery of America. It is easier to believe that the oysters in question are neither prehistoric nor mediæval, and that they found their way into the refuse-heap after the importation of American oysters to Glasgow at some time during the last few years."

The quæstio vexata of the fort at Dunbuie and the supposed crannogs at Dumbuck and Langbank is as tangled a skein as ever, in spite of Mr. Andrew Lang's having broken a lance or two in the mêlée. We would like to see one of those graphic sketches by Mr. E. T. Reed on our prehistoric ancestors of the Clyde carving the Celts, arrow-heads, amulets and other "queer things" to mystify the savants of the nineteenth century! The illustrations in this volume are worth study, and help the lay reader to follow the learned and often amusing text.

THE EARLY COMMENTATOR

A Chapter in the History of Annotation: Being Scholia Aristophanica, vol. iii. By WILLIAM G. RUTHERFORD. (Macmillan, 25s. net.)

THIS is really the third volume of Dr. Rutherford's monumental work on the Scholia of Aristophanes. The reason why that which was the title of the earlier volumes has now become the sub-title is given in the Preface. He now finds that it was a mistake to break the Scholia up as in vols. i. and ii. This volume is devoted to an analysis and dissection of the Scholia, revealing "their veritable nature."

d "the purely mechanical process which produced them." Dr. Rutherford thinks that we now have arrived at a crisis when we must be prepared for a drift of opinion such that "contact with the alert and adventurous Greek mind may cease at least for a time to play any considerable part in English education." He thinks that in the teaching of Greek now "there is so much commentary that the learner never lays his mind close to the Greek thought." This began its life in the dreary period in which Greece, no longer her own mistress, made shift to give her masters what they wished—such a knowledge of Greek literature as could be acquired without mental exertion by men who were out of sympathy with Greek thought and did not care to understand it, yet desired to turn it to some use."

he book seeks to show how master and servant were both punished.

The result is nearly 500 pages of learned and subtle comment on learning as first applied to the study of Greek. The art of Annotation is pursued through criticism, exegesis, and æsthesis; and the prominent feature of Greek annotation is brought out, the fact that the ancient Greek annotator kept before his mind the spoken, not the written, word. "When they criticised the poets and the orators of past generations they criticised them as speaking, not as writing." Hence reading is ἀναγνώρισις, which is properly "reading aloud," and hence the amazing attempts which the Greeks made to impart to written the vivacity of spoken language. Some effort is made in modern times to achieve the same result by means of typographical devices. But not only was the Greek system of particles much more than a thousand years earlier than any typographical device, but it was really far more effective. The Greek particles are better rendered now by the printer's than the translator's art. A Greek writer would have used the particle ὅθεν where a conservative journal would now employ inverted commas in referring to the Irish "Nationalists," meaning thereby that a certain party claim a name to which they have no right. So ὅ and γέ are far better represented by italics than by "indeed," "forsooth," "at least." Indeed, modern typographical devices might with advantage be employed largely in editing classical (especially Greek) books. The fact that the use of the foot-note never occurred to the ancient Greeks has introduced an infinity of confusion into Aristotle and Plato, and there are places in Thucydides where the train of thought is quite dislocated by a digression which would now find its place in an Appendix. The Greek system of accentuation doubtless arose from a like desire to assimilate the written to the spoken word, but how the Greeks intimated that the penult of, say, ἑλπίδα was at the same time short and accented, it is hard to understand. We modern "barbarians" abandon the accent and cleave to the quantity, the modern Greek does the reverse. It seems to us that the barbarians have the best of the bargain. It is extremely difficult to make a modern Athenian schoolboy feel the rhythm of an hexameter, and no wonder when the second line of the Iliad is read by him as "Ovloménen hé myrf' Achæeis álge' éthéken."

The pith of the work of the scholiasts lay in exegesis. Their critical work, or restoration of the text, was, as a rule, futile in the extreme. Yet Galen, a contemporary of the early scholiasts, was a born critic, a Bentley of his age. Dr. Rutherford quotes from him (p. 56) an amazingly modern doctrine: the critic ought not to believe that a sensible man has deliberately written nonsense or mis-stated facts: if he finds nonsense in his copy he must conclude that his copy is wrong: then, if he can find no other copy containing a better version, he must try to restore the text, but he must never neglect the answer to the question unde irrepsit corruptela? If modern critics followed the advice of Galen, we should have a better series of Clarendon Press texts and a better Corpus Poetarum.

From some interesting quotations on p. 99, we should be disposed to believe that Euripides and Menander, like Ibsen and George Bernard Shaw in modern times, understood far better than their contemporaries the powers and the limits of the actors of their day, knew just what they could express and what they could not; and thus it was that their dramas were far better as played than as read, and always appeared to the audience to be acted with consummate art.

There are very good observations in Bk. II., Pt. I., ch. ii. on stage directions which have got into the text, and on some very silly scholiastic admonitions. Even Galen thought that when the Athenians used the shorter form of the 3rd plur. imper., as when Sophocles wrote in the Ajax:

ταῦτα νῦν Αἰδῶς τε σωζόντων κάτω, they were employing the genitive plural of the participle. No less absurd, indeed, is the rule which till quite recently was the accepted teaching (and perhaps is in some places still) about the case to be used for "place in which"—a rule which ignored the existence of a locative case and which was as absurdly devoid of principle as would be a statement that the "place where" was put in the genitive in fair weather and on weekdays, but in the ablative on Sundays, and when the weather-glass pointed to change.

The article on Metaphor (pp. 203 ff.) is excellent reading, and, indeed, throughout the whole book a dry subject is lightened by much brilliancy of style especially in the way of illustration, in his skill wherein Dr. Rutherford often reminds one of his brilliant compatriot, Thomas Carlyle. In proof of this assertion we would refer our readers to Bk. II., Pt. III., ch. ii. pp. 381 ff. On p. 410 we meet a comment on a verse (515) of the Plutus of Aristophanes: "we have in this verse already a whiff of the Middle Comedy"—a rare flower in the dust-heaps of scholiastic annotation.

But a notice in a weekly journal is quite inadequate for a work of such compass and learning as the one before us, except to direct our readers to a great storehouse of valuable and (for the subject) wonderfully readable comment. It is worthy of the very high reputation of its author, and we hope its teaching will prove an antidote to the poison of those who would turn the study of the classics into the counting of the occurrences of γέ in Plato and Aristotle, or the examples of and the (perhaps more numerous) exceptions to the Clauselgesetz in Cicero and Livy.

ÉMILE VERHAEREN

Les heures d'après midi. By ÉMILE VERHAEREN. (Bruxelles: chez l'Editeur Edmond Deman.)

THE Belgians who write for Belgium write in Flemish. Henri Conscience and Camille Lemonnier are perhaps the only two of them whose names have crossed the frontier. The Belgians who write for Europe write in French, and at least three names are familiar: those of Georges Rodenbach, Maurice Maeterlinck, and Émile Verhaeren. Naturally, they have their common note. In the work of all of them alike—of the novelist no less than of the dramatist and the poet—there is something of the dead cities and the dreary dunes, and something also of that indefinable thing called "mysticism." But whereas Georges Rodenbach perished in his pessimism, and without ever having escaped from the haunting melancholy which gives its nightmare effect to "Bruges-la-Morte," Émile Verhaeren has ripened. The hours of the afternoon, in the title of his new poem, symbolise the autumn of his life. They might have been empty hours, but love fills them, and therefore they are very good. That is the burden of his song. He writes of love, not with the passionate extravagance of youth, but with a certain resolute and intense serenity. These lines, perhaps, better than any others sum the matter up:

"Vous m'avez dit, tel soir, des paroles si belles Que sans doute les fleurs qui se penchaient vers nous,
Soudain nous ont aimé et qu'une d'entre elles,
Pour nous toucher tous deux, tomba sur nos genoux."

" Vous me parliez des temps prochains où nos années,
Comme des fruits trop mûrs se laisseraient cueillir ;
Comment éclaterait le glas des destinées
Et comme on s'aimerait, en se sentant vieillir.

" Votre voix m'enlaçait comme une chère étreinte,
Et votre cœur brûlait si tranquillement beau
Qu'en ce moment j'aurais pu voir s'ouvrir sans crainte
Les tortueux chemins qui vont vers le tombeau."

Again and again that note is struck, and that idea repeated: that love may make of life a triumphant pilgrimage. The sound of triumph rings clearly in the passage which we quote next:

" L'aube, l'ombre, le soir, l'espace et les étoiles ;
Ce que la nuit recèle ou montre entre ses voiles,
Se mêle à la ferveur de notre être exalté.
Ceux qui vivent d'amour, vivent d'éternité.

" Il n'importe que leur raison adhère ou raille
Et leur tendre, debout, sur ses hautes murailles,
Au long des quais et des hâvres ses flambeaux clairs ;
Eux, sont les voyageurs d'au delà de la mer.

" Ils regardent le jour luire de plage en plage, Très loin, plus loin que l'océan et ses flots noirs ;
La fixe certitude et le tremblant espoir
Pour leurs regards ardents ont le même visage.

" Heureux et clairs, ils croient, avec avidité ;
Leur cœur est la profonde et soudaine clarté
Dont ils brûlent le front des plus hautains problèmes ;
Et pour savoir le monde, ils ne scrutent qu'eux-mêmes.

" Ils vont, par les chemins lointains, choisis par eux, Vivant des vérités que leur disent leurs yeux
Simples et nus, profonds et doux comme l'aurore ;
Et pour eux seuls, les paradis chantent encore."

The picture not less than the sentiment enchains the reader there. Verhaeren sees nearly all things in pictures with rich colours. He is far removed, in this his later work, at all events, from the drabness of Rodenbach. Let us quote in conclusion a passage which illustrates at once this quality of his poems and his symbolism:

" O le calme jardin d'été où rien ne bouge !
Sinon là-bas, vers le milieu
De l'étang clair et radieux,
Pareils à des langues de feu,
Des poissons rouges.

" Ce sont nos souvenirs jouant en nos pensées
Calme et apaisées
Et lucide...—comme cette eau
De confiance et de repos.

" Et l'eau s'éclaire et les poissons sautillent
Au brusque et merveilleux soleil,
Parmi les ajoncs verts et les blanches coquilles
Et les ronds d'or, immobiles Autour des bords vermeils.

" Et c'est doux de les voir aller, venir ainsi, Dans la fraîcheur et la splendeur
Qui les effleure,
Sans crainte aucune et sans souci.
Qu'ils ramènent, du fond à la surface,
D'autres regrets que des regrets fugaces."

THE RUSSIAN NAVY

The Russian Navy in the Russo-Japanese War. By Capt. N. KLADO. (Hurst and Blackett, 5s.)

CAPT. KLADO'S book contains a collection of articles which were published last winter in the Novoe Vremya under the pseudonym of "Priboj," to which the author has given the title of "After the Departure of the Second Pacific Squadron." The articles were written with the laudable object of warning the Russian nation against being defeated by the Japanese; a few of the headlines will show the drift of the argument: "Feverish preparations must be made at once for war," "We ought to be ready before the Black Sea Squadron must sail for the Far East in spite of all treaties." The book is written from an ultra-Russian point of view and contains a good deal which is unpalatable to an English reader. It is, however, instructive to read the following in connection with the North Sea outrage: "We offer our most sincere thanks to our brave sailors for the watchfulness which they have shown. We thank them because they were not afraid of their peril, to assume heavy responsibility by immediately opening fire on the unknown torpedo-boats, taking account of the presence of the fishing-boats (some neutrals), dominated as they were by the one thought, the great mission with which Russia had entrusted them. That is an example of the outbursts of patriotism which the gallant captain gives vent at intervals through the pages of this book, and, assuming his patriotism to be genuine, it is to his credit. But even this great virtue does not atone for lack of critical faculty and of knowledge of his profession. Capt. Klado's forecasts have indeed some cases been borne out by facts, but he does not resemble a sailor. As for the present English form of his book which has been translated by Mr. L. J. H. Dickinson from the French text of M. René Marchand, little need be said. The absence of grammar in the book presents us with a strange and unexpected form of the horror of war.

THE ELDER BROTHER

The Life of Reason, Or the Phases of Human Progress. GEORGE SANTAYANA. Vol. I. Introduction and Reason in Common Sense. (New York. Scribner, $1.25 net.)

To find a philosopher who can express himself as well as think is delightful and rare. Even the divine Plato was overtaken by a habit of arguing with specialists, in a language which had and has no real currency. The communication of ideas to children and poor people is one of the divine faculties attributed to Christ. Hence Mr. Santayana's books have not been calculated to resemble the Parables; nevertheless, we think, they must bring many, who are no longer children and were never poor, to the cry of the Younger Brother in Milton's "Comus":

"How charming is divine philosophy!
Not harsh, and crabbed, as dull fools suppose."

Now, to feel like the Younger Brother when he utters the cry, is in itself an end, an ideal. Common Sense will be anxious to dispute that nothing which philosophy effects is to be compared with the creation of this mood. And philosophers, like Mr. Santayana, who set out with common sense and envisage progress, must acquiesce. What philosophers regard as their results, are almost set in the course of time to be regarded as of partial and limited application. But this mood of hunger and thirst after truth, and joy in the apparent satisfaction of that craving, are endlessly beneficial both to the individuals who experience it and all who are about them. Mr. Santayana's former book of essays, entitled "Interpretations of Poetry and Religion," came to us as the achievement of English prose, since Pater was at his best. His new book looks as long as summer appeared in childhood, and the time when we shall no longer be able to find new pleasures in it seems as distant as winter does in June. There are to be four volumes besides this: Reason in Society, Reason in Religion, Reason in Art, Reason in Science.

Mr. Santayana writes beautifully; his style has plums, but it is good even where there are none. He can be brilliantly brief and weighty, and deliver long-drawn-out expositions with harmonious grandeur.

"Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it."
"Fanaticism consists in redoubling your effort when you have forgotten your aim."

"Those who look back upon the history of opinion for many centuries commonly feel, by a vague but profound instinct, that certain consecrated doctrines have an inherent dignity and spirituality, while other speculative tendencies and other vocabularies seem welded to all is ignoble and shallow. So fundamental is this moral tone in sophy that people are usually more firmly convinced that their own are precious than that they are true." This world, we call it, not without justifiable pathos, for many worlds are conceivable and if discovered might prove more real and intelligible and more akin to the soul than this strange ether which man has hitherto always looked upon with increasing misgiving.

We quote to give an idea of Mr. Santayana's charm and power, not of his most illuminating thoughts; these last usually need leading up to at greater length than could here be spared. His general drift may be indicated, however.

To adjust all demands to one ideal and adjust that ideal to its natural conditions—in other words, to live the Life of Reason—is nothing perfectly possible."

Reason as such represents or rather constitutes a single formal rest, the interest in harmony."

Satisfaction is the touchstone of value."

Conduct that should not justify itself somehow by the satisfactions secured and the pains avoided would not justify itself at all."

Happiness is the only sanction of life; where happiness fails, existence remains a mad and lamentable experiment."

The future of moral evolution is accordingly infinite, but its character is more and more determinate at every step."

Such are the general conclusions that Reason draws from Common Sense. To many who follow him in all this with light there will seem a strange wrong-headedness in Mr. Santayana's treatment of the character of Christ, which, he says, "is not the character of a benefactor but of a martyr." One has only to confront such a statement with the words: "I am come that they might have life, and at they might have it more abundantly," to feel that he ignores one of the traits most universally attributed to Christ, the bringer of good news, the bringer of peace and joy, who "went about doing good." We should rather have expected Mr. Santayana to regret that the accidental circumstances of Jesus' death and passion, having formed a striking image of the means by which he fulfilled his enigmatical functions, have taken the place of those means themselves in the popular imagination. The slip our author makes here is like that venerable error of popular Christianity, and amounts to no more than the misapplication of an illustration; it does not touch the validity of his ideas, which quite certainly owe more of their inspiration to Christ than he realises.

It was, perhaps, impossible for the author of so ambitious work to prevent occasionally falling back on philosophical argument; we fail to see what a sentence gains by being loaded in this way:

"Reason and humanity begin with the union of instinct and ideation; when instinct becomes enlightened, establishes values in its objects, and is turned from a process into an art, while at the same time consciousness becomes practical and cognitive, beginning to contain some symbol or record of the co-ordinate realities among which it arises."

We venture to re-write this sentence thus:

"Reason and humanity begin when instinct becomes enlightened and, establishing values, is turned from a process into an art, while at the same time consciousness conceives some incipient symbol or record."

Words like "ideation" and "cognitive" are no doubt valuable, but the more rarely we meet them in a style the more we respect them; nor can we appreciate what is lacking to this sentence when re-written as above.

Mr. Santayana need desire no higher praise than the assurance that he appears to many as the Elder Brother who makes them realise the charm of divine philosophy. It is strange that such a character should arise for us in America, and not from those of our own blood but from a Spanish stock. Rossetti is an instance of how inspiring and fecund the genius of the Latin races becomes when grafted and growing among us; in the author of "The Life of Reason" we have another instance. He too brings us inspiration in a manner as delightful as it is distinguished. He proposes to traverse the whole field of modern thought with us, and we shall gladly accompany him.

MR. MEREDITH'S REVISION OF "RICHARD FEVEREL"

EVEN among those who find him too "difficult," I take it that Mr. George Meredith has been accepted as the greatest English novelist now living, a literary artist, indeed, in a class by himself. This much has at least been effected by the younger generation of critics, who have insisted on his modern pre-eminence, and his assured place among the immortals. But the very tardiness of this recognition of a novelist whose masterpieces were contemporary with those of George Eliot has had one unfortunate result, if we are to attribute Mr. Meredith's repeated changes in the text of his earlier novels to a sense of the want of appreciation shown for them by the public. In the article on Mr. Meredith in the "Encyclopædia Britannica," I have already said that "it will be the duty of future editors to restore 'Richard Feverel' and 'Evan Harrington' (and these are not the only ones in question) to their earliest versions": and it may be interesting to indicate for the benefit of "Meredithians" generally what is involved in the former of these two instances. It would appear to be none the less necessary because, in spite of a fairly full exposure in 1897 of the drastic revision which had taken place in the new edition then published by Messrs. Constable, a London literary paper recently printed an editorial paragraph naively inquiring what were the alterations which "rumour had it" that Mr. Meredith had made.

I do not propose to discuss here the changes in "Richard Feverel" that characterised the 1897 edition. Lovers of Mr. Meredith's novels are pretty well agreed, I fancy, in declining with all respect to consider that latest "authorised version" preferable to what may be called the textus receptus, previously familiar in the single-volume edition issued by Messrs. Chapman and Hall. But this latter edition itself represented a considerable revision, compared with the original three-volume edition of 1859. Of all the novels, "Richard Feverel" was the greatest sufferer by this early revision. I will confine myself to pointing out shortly the nature and extent of the cutting-down to which it was subjected, premising only that the earliest version is incomparably the finest, and that some of the changes were responsible for unnecessary obscurities in the popularly received text, with which I compare it. I look forward to a time when the 1859 version will be restored to the market in a reprint, instead of its being, as now, a rare "find" for the collector.

Of the original first five chapters no less than 69 per cent. of the matter was cut out; the opening of chapter v. becomes that of chapter ii.; the first four chapters are condensed into chapter i., 80 per cent. of their original matter being omitted. Out of a total of 25,260 lines in the original book, 1768 were cut out, 1559 of these being from the first five chapters (2268 lines), and 1395 from the first four (1729). Or, in what is equivalent to pages, 71 were altogether cut out of 1010; 62 of these being from the first five chapters (91 pages). These figures surely speak for themselves. Over 7 per cent. of the original novel was omitted.

But we are not concerned merely with quantity. The omitted portions in the early chapters are particularly valuable, because they explain Sir Austin Feverel and his surroundings (particularly Lady Blandish, who in the later version is rather unintelligible), and the Feverel family (particularly Algernon), and give details about young Richard's boyhood and about Sir Austin's famous "System," in a way which not only has a real interest on its own account but sheds light over all the rest of the book. It would be deplorable if the delightful mock-heroic and fanciful fun of the episodes connected with the besieging of Sir Austin by his following of admiring ladies, intent on his conversion to a greater appreciation of woman, were permanently divorced from the book; and the same reflection applies to the revelations of Sir Austin's mind, in his conversations with old Dr. Clifford about young Richard's upbringing, and in his analysis of the problems of a boy's education. I cannot here quote from Sir Austin's conversational combats with the ladies, "the female harriers" who "were in the field prepared to give chase to the Griffin": Miss Blewins, Lady Blandish, the Hon. Mrs. Breakyeline, Camilla Duvergey, Mrs. McMurphy, the "Irish giantess, who made a point of asking directly of men whatever she wanted," and Mrs. Cashentire, the "banker's wife, who behaved as if she had been his relict." It is all delightful reading. But how could Mr. Meredith have had the heart to cut out several charming stories of Richard's childhood? This, for instance, concerning Richard's seventh birthday. They are all at the cricket field, when a messenger comes for Sir Austin, who jogs his son's hand and says: "Come along, the doctor is waiting for us:"

"The doctor!" exclaimed Lady Blandish, "whatever can the dear boy want with a doctor?"

"He is seven years old to-day, Madam," replied Sir Austin. "I wish him to be examined medically from head to foot, that I may be sure he is physically sound for his second seven years' march, as he is morally promising."

"The Baronet smiled down on his son, and beheld a cloud not at all morally promising on the brows of him."

"Come!" he said.

"No," cried Richard, releasing his hand.

"Come," his father repeated, while his brows went up.

Richard fell back sullenly.

"I desire you to come, my boy," said his father, with the gentle severity of a last command.

"And the young seven-year-old, wrought to the farthest pitch of endurance, stamped his foot, and flushed, as he cried, looking his father full in the face, 'I won't! Damned if I do!'"

"Of course he had to go: but when he came back, approved robust, he was covered with the caresses of the field, and enjoyed an enraptured hug from Lady Blandish: the lady provoking thereby these reflections in the Pilgrim's Scrip, 'On the Popularity of the Forbidden Fruit, and the preference we have for it, provided an Innocent offer it us.'"

Excellent "Pilgrim's Scrip" utterances, too, have been jettisoned:

"His thoughts were sad enough; occasionally dark; here and there comical in their oddness; nevertheless there ran through the volume a fire of Hope; and they did him an injustice who said he lacked Charity. Thus he wrote: 'I am happy when I know my neighbour's vice.' And it was set down as the word of a cynic; when rightly weighed, it was a plea for tolerance. He said again: 'Life is a tedious process of learning we are Fools.' And this also is open to mild interpretation, if we do not take a special umbrage at the epithet. For, as he observes, by way of comment: 'When we know ourselves Fools, we are already something better.'"

"Thou that thinkest thyself adored," says the Pilgrim's Scrip, "Oh! Fool! it is not Thou she loveth, but the Difficulty."

Here is an instance of the danger of cutting. On p. 307 of the usual edition, the account of the discomfiture and dismissal of the butler, "heavy" Benson, concludes: "Ravnam was quit of the one believer in the Great Shaddock dogma." Most readers must have been puzzled by this, since the "Great Shaddock dogma" has not previously been mentioned, and they are left to guess at its meaning. But on pp. 59, 60, of the first edition occurs this passage, afterwards omitted:

"We live and learn," said the Baronet to young Adrian Harley, his nephew and intimate; "but it is odd that, when we whip her, Madam should love us the more." "You have propounded it frequently, sir," replied that clever youth, "in the 'Great Shaddock Dogma'" (for so, on account of its constant and ungenerous citation of the primal slip in Paradise, Adrian chose to entitle the Pilgrim's Scrip).

Almost as good an instance of creating an obscurity by omitting the explanation is given by the following passage in the received edition:

"A venerable lady, known as Great-aunt Grantley, who had money to bequeath to the heir, occupied with Hippas the background of the house and shared her candles with him. These two were seldom seen at dinner-hour, for which they were all day preparing, and probably remembering, for the eighteenth century was an admirable man, and cast aside while there was a dish on the table."

The last lines are almost incomprehensible as they stand but in the first edition, after the words "to the" comes the now omitted "and whom Adrian called the Eighteenth Century"; the capital letters being repeated in the second use of the phrase. It may also have attentive readers know why Great-aunt Grantley have "shared her candles" with Hippas; this is apparently a misprint for "candles" (1st ed.).

To conclude, the 1859 edition is even better, compared with the textus receptus, than the latter is, compared with the 1897 version—and that is saying a great deal. Mr. Meredith has cut out would be enough to make the fortune of any other novelist. I lay this stress on "Richard Feverel" because it is probably the favorite with most "Meredithians," and those who love the book in its ordinary form will find it twice as good in the original. The value of a "first edition" in this case is not merely its rarity, but in the fact that it is so different from subsequent editions, and that the alterations have all been for the worse.

HUGH CRISWELL

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

MY EARLY READING

SOME few days ago I was looking into a book that made me feel, like Burns, that "I had spent my youthful years and done naething," without even his consolation of having "made some blethers up in rhyme for his singing." The volume was by one of the most distinguished women-writers of to-day, and in one of the chapters she gave an account of her early reading. Before the age of seven this golden girl had read, among others, Fielding—indeed!—Thackeray, George Eliot, Swinburne, Ossian, Defoe, Florence Marryat, Shakespeare, Rhoda Broughton, Swift and others "too numerous to mention," or rather copy out. At twelve (Good Lord, what did I read at twelve?) she took keen pleasure in Dante, and "hell with its undying tortures seemed perfectly normal and right. What an encyclopædia one would have been now if the beginning like this had been made! It makes one blush to tell the simple unadorned truth, yet to do so may serve as a warning if not for instruction.

The first book I remember was the "Pilgrim's Progress," and with a disregard for binding which clings to me still, it was carried in my pocket till the covers were worn off and the leaves had all curled up at the edges. It was read in snatches at a sort of dame-school to which I was sent, and was used to wile away the half-hours during which a dear old schoolmistress in spectacles fancied her pupil cornered at his tables. My memories of the book are that I thought Christian and his burden a poor groaning chicken-hearted body, Greatheart being much more to my mind. The women-folk generally were uninteresting, but people like the Man with the Muck-rake exercised a curious fascination. For many a long day the "Pilgrim's Progress" was the only piece of vital literature that came my way. On wet Sunday afternoons I pored over a volume called "Joys and Sorrows of Childhood" which had in it a dog called Snow, but the beginning and the end were both lost so that I was and am to this day ignorant of the author's name. A pleasant aroma seems to cling round that book, but then it was taken from a bookcase where nearly everything else was learned and dull.

May the much-read lady who was deep in Dante at twelve regard me without more disdain than she can help, but what trash I read at the same age compared with her! Captain Mayne Reid and Fenimore Cooper and Captain Marryat were the classics of the bookshelf. The others are nameless. I found out some one who took in the Family Herald and for years I devoured that periodical from cover to cover and with so hearty an appetite that I put to it I could retell many of the tales to-day. Once or ce a Scott came my way and well do I remember the den summer afternoon—how richly the sun dropped behind the hill, how gay the house-martins were, as in the evening light they came in a mad chase up to my dormitory window and away in a quick descent—when "Ivanhoe" was devoured rather than read. Even then I had acquired the habit, never relinquished since, of finishing a single sitting every book I began. Many so read were declared by my elders and betters to be immoral and were taken away, but a child has no morality and they never did either good or ill. Between eight and eighteen were fish that came to my net, and I confess with reluctance, most distinguished lady, that much which I assimilated as though it were milk for babes was Greek to me. Shakespeare I could not read, and to this day I never like to read dialogue; moreover, dear lady, I am convinced that my early repugnance was due to an artistic instinct. In dialogue you need to hear the characters speaking; prose narrative is the proper form for a story meant to be read.

Children naturally dislike what is artificial, but where are natural children to be found to-day? If I may be allowed to digress from these short and simple annals for a moment, it will be to protest against the fashion of treating children like hot-house plants. Yes, dear lady, you are a flagrant example. At twelve, instead of being so familiar with Christian doctrines as you say you were, you should have been familiar with the skipping-rope, you would have known more about the brown hills and the creatures that live on them, you should have known the stars and the noise of falling water. Do not say that you did, for I have read your books, Madam—admired the great genius of them and regretted that it should be expended in copyist's work. Never do these members of the aristocracy whom you love to delineate seem to be aware that behind the very board whereon they play their fantastic tricks there is a background so vast and mysterious that beside it they are mere insects playing in the sun. If you did truly read and re-read the works you mention, you must have noticed how saturated were the best of them with love of nature; Shakespeare, whom you place first, did not spend his youth in conning musty tomes, but in the open air where, all unconsciously, he received those impressions of stars and wind and flower and rain that he later gave forth in immortal verse. You are of the town only; nature has no place in your books, and your people are of the hot-house. And all this is a lesson to the British mother to let her offspring run wild a little and not to stand over her with a notebook ready to jot down the clever utterances of the precious darling.

At times every healthy man laughs at himself, and it occurs to me now that the last paragraph exemplifies the weakness of human nature, always ready by an ingenious argument to prove the thesis: "My way is the right way." However, to go on with our story. I was at least left to follow my own course in the choice of books, or, rather, so far as that went, neglected altogether. Since much of my childhood was solitary, and the intervals between shooting, fishing and other diversions wide and frequent, it will excite no surprise that my mind soon became stuffed full of romances of the most common description—so much so that there was serious talk of interdicting reading altogether. But the wisest and kindest of the family coming to the rescue declared that it was best to leave the child alone—all would come right in its own natural time and place. So it did: the appetite that once had been omnivorous became extremely fastidious—not much to the owner's joy perhaps.

But in the meantime the lesson was learned. Nature is the first and most important object of study. The man that you actually see—the dock-labourer at his task, the hind saving his lazy strength as he lounges at fair or market, the children running wildly from school—these form genuine and primary material. But all that comes from books is second-hand, and what you study and re-deliver from their pages becomes at once third-hand.

They are good servants but bad masters. And again, if we go to nature, let us take her at her simplest, not in the sophisticated members of what is called Society, but in the cottage and on the furrow. So shall be built a lasting and noble heritage of tested and true experience.

FICTION

La Vie d'un Simple, Mémoires d'un métayer. By ÉMILE GUILLAUMIN. (Paris, P. V. Stock.)

No book has been more widely read this spring in literary Paris than this faithful review of the peasant-farmer's life; written, not by a man of letters, but by a peasant-farmer, the neighbour, possibly the son or grandson, of the old gaffer whose hard life is here recorded with a simple charm of diction that recalls "The Vicar of Wakefield." The père Tiennon, like the Vicar of Wakefield, was from time to time the victim of a crafty neighbour; but here all likeness ends: in the twentieth century we are realists; we paint no pretty fancy pictures of an idyllic poverty; and hardened indeed must be the novel-reader whose heart is not wrung by this almost cruel picture of the sordid sorrows of the very poor. As we read we realise, perhaps for the first time, what it is—not what it would be to us, but what it is to those born and bred in these conditions—to be always at work, always tired, always overwrought, always overcrowded, always hungry, always fighting against a rebellious body that cries out for food and warmth and rest; what it must be never to have leisure for thought or sentiment; to be ignorant, not because one is stupid, but because at five years old one must earn one's living as a goose-boy, and there is never any time to learn; to change from a little tender child to a self-engrossed man, because the struggle with starvation has left time for nothing else. How often on a frosty winter day, when we see country folk at a fair or market have we not said to ourselves: "They have been used to the cold all their lives, they don't feel it as we should." Alas! in these pages we find that cold is to the ill-fed, ill-clothed children of the poor a greater torture than to the children of the well-to-do. Little Tiennon (Etienne) Bertin, as a child, was in every feeling of mind and body exactly like a child born to an easier lot: it was to him the same delight to guard the sheep for half an hour on a sunny hill-side—the same misery to watch them a livelong day of hot sun or searching wind, the same frenzy of terror to see a snake creep through the grass or to meet a gipsy; the same wound—scarring his tender heart for all time—to be scolded. A cuff, a clout, a sharp word, an unjust reproach, hurt him in his childhood as much—since he remembers the pain of them at eighty!—as they would have hurt you and me.

His father was never willingly unkind to the little lad; it was the mother, exasperated by too much work and too much child-bearing and too little sleep and food, who struck and scolded. But it was the father who took the child to help him drive the pigs to the fair, and forgot the poor creature in the seductions of the tavern; leaving him hungry and terrified and cold, from noon till nine o'clock at night alone in the market square. Read these pages, and you will never forget them. They leave the impression of something that has happened to oneself, and at the end of the narration you know how much it is possible for a child to suffer in mind and body through an adventure that had appeared trivial if less well told. The first chapters are the best and the most charming of the book; but if they stood alone the work would have been incomplete. We should say: "It shows that there are people of finer feelings in all classes. A sensitive person, born in these conditions, is greatly to be pitied." But as Tiennon grows to manhood he becomes, not the son of his own soft childhood, but of his life. Life hardens and coarsens him, as it had hardened his parents, and though he remains to the end a good man, it is his soul rather than his body that becomes inured to his conditions. His thoughts turn on an ever smaller orbit, and cold, heat, hard fare, work, overcrowding remain painful to the end. His finer feelings dwindle; his physical sensitiveness remains intact.

That the life of French peasant-farmers is still, in out-of-the-way places, as hard as the life of Tiennon, the present writer knows: he has seen the tiny, frightened shepherds on the mountains, and the cabin in which there is but one room for living and sleeping, occupied by two or three couples and their children, in health and sickness, even in death, in conditions so hard that the care of the aged and the sick becomes a burden almost too heavy to be borne. "Oh! will he never die?" "My goodness! how long is she going to drag on?"—such are the cries of women, not unkind by nature, but so weary that pity for others is driven out by pity for themselves. The work of the farm never ends: it is seed-time or harvest, lambing or calving, from New Year to St. Sylvester's: and in the autumn there is the annual reckoning, whereat the métayer believes himself cheated by the landlord, and the landlord feels that the farmer has got the better of him in every transaction of the year. We who have hitherto looked at such partnerships through the landlord's spectacles, now see them through the farmer's, and realise how hard it must be to give satisfaction to one's métayer. No landlord in all his life satisfied Tiennon, some for reasons which appear good to us, and some for reasons that make the reader smile. "Où il n'y a pas communion d'idées règne le malaise," reflects the shrewd old peasant.

The long life, beginning in 1823, embraces the period of the Franco-Prussian War and the earlier times of conscription, when parents ensured their sons with a "marchand d'hommes" who guaranteed to find a substitute should they draw an unlucky number. Tiennon himself drew a good number, as did both his sons also, but these were taken none the less in war time; and here we enter into the sorrows of people who are separated and who can neither read nor write. It is a book to make the staunchest supporter of the established order a socialist, and it is that rarest thing in modern French fiction, dead in conventionalism—a human document, and a human document very precious to all Frenchmen who care for their country and their race. The peasant, from mistrust of the outsider and from shyness of his own "mauvais langage," remains a sealed book to dwellers of all classes in the towns and to the countryman who speaks correctly, seldom opening his mind to strangers even in the comradeship of the military service—that universal hardship which, with all its evils, has the great counterpoising good, that it teaches Frenchmen of all stations the sufferings of the poor.

Peace on Earth. By REGINALD TURNER. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

MR. REGINALD TURNER is one of the most interesting of our younger novelists. He has a nice sense of character, wealth of sympathy, and, above all, a quiet irony, occasionally somewhat grim, but very agreeable to the cultivated palate. His novels are novels of atmosphere rather than of incident. That is to say, it is not the things that happen which interest him most, but the social milieu in which they happen. This milieu is always drawn with extreme care; in "Cynthia's Damages" it was the life of the stage, in "The Comedy of Progress" that of politics, in "Castles in Kensington" that of watering-place gentility. His latest book, "Peace on Earth," is concerned with that vague, not quite articulate discontent with present social conditions which finds its expression nowadays either in active philanthropic effort or in mere intellectual anarchism, according to the temperament of the patient. This gives opportunity for several carefully finished studies of character: Sladen, the eccentric philanthropist whose anti-social theories are only strengthened by the disapproval of his neighbours, but grow seriously attenuated when he becomes the fashion and Princesses smile upon his efforts; Hope, the man with a grievance, the philosophic anarchist to whom the law represents a worse tyranny than any merely despotic act of irresponsible power; Paul, his pupil in this cheerful creed; and Leighton, the broad-minded country parson with an incurable propensity for finding good in everybody. There are also several of those slighter studies, thumb-nail sketches as it were, touched with ironic humour, at which Mr. Turner excels. Kreisler, the Alsatian, who periodically bids his comrades at the Anarchist café a solemn farewell preparatory to committing suicide, but usually returns quite alive after a longer or shorter period, is in his best vein.

"'Good-bye comrades,' he would say, 'this is the end.'"

"He pointed significantly to his forehead."

"'A bullet there and the world will be set right for me.' With a final nod to the patronne, who answered him in a cheerfully resigned manner, he would leave the café."

"'Poor fellow!' muttered the men; 'he's the only wise one amongst us.'"

"'Après tout,' said the patronne, 'c'était un brave garçon.'"

The next day Kreisler would be absent. Then the day after he would slink in and take his accustomed place. He would be very gloomy for a day or two, as if ashamed of himself or afraid of the ridicule of his comrades. Then in due time the periodical resolution would come again and the same ceremony of farewell would be gone through."

At last there comes a day when, after the customary farewells, Kreisler does not return. But it is not a case of suicide after all. He has been run over by a motor-car! What Mr. Turner's book lacks is unity, but the amusement in it atones for its construction.

The Friendships of Veronica. By THOMAS COBB. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

THE rapidity and apparent ease with which Mr. Cobb turns out his books is amazing; if our memory is not at fault this is the third novel he has published since the year began. "The Friendships of Veronica" (why not "Veronica's Friendships"?), so far from showing signs of hurry or exhaustion, is the best story we have read of the last half-dozen bearing Mr. Cobb's name. While it is cheerful and light-hearted as usual—Mr. Cobb shuns gloomy views on any subject—it is less trifling and superficial than he sometimes permits his work to be, and touches a deeper note of interest and feeling. The only doubt that mars the pleasure of reading the story is whether the Right Honourable Albert Firminger, Home Secretary, and indispensable man of his party, is the sort of person to make a voluntary confession about his "past" to anybody, in any circumstances. Impulse it is not; unwisdom it undoubtedly is, and all the facts of Albert Firminger's career are dead against the probability of his confiding his secret to a girl with whom he is upon merely agreeable social terms. However, the incident accepted—and it is the leading incident—the story runs on almost of itself, developing naturally and with increasing pleasure to the reader. It bears hardly upon Firminger, whose gallant fight against fate and himself tempts us to wish that, even at the cost of evasion and untruthful silence, he may escape recognition, and go on and prosper. That temptation is a testimony to the author's cleverness and skill. The Home Secretary, a widower who is also a man of fashion and of politics, and a successful dramatist, all exchange the rôle of friend for that of lover, sincere but not ardent, as the title implies. Finally, when Veronica gives her hand to the right man, some regret goes with it, for her decision ends her pleasant friendships, and she realises, as Byron did, that "lovers never can be friends."

The Wise Woods. By MRS. HENRY DUDENEY. (Heinemann, 6s.)

MRS. DUDENEY tells her story with force; she interests, she compels a shudder, but she never braces or consoles. Even when her lovers are united for a time, their ultimate doom depresses the atmosphere. Perhaps that is why her realism leaves so strong an impression of unreality. Certainly, if her world was the only one open to us we should wish to leave it as quickly as possible. But no one sees life truly who sees only its failures and its cruelties. It was not the outside world that made a sordid tragedy of Ambrose Bellchamber's adventures but his own unstable soul; while Vashti is driven to violent acts of folly in order to escape from her comfortable surroundings. In fact, here as elsewhere, Mrs. Dudeney's men and women live in a debateable land, and are neither sane, nor insane. The hideous things that happen to them are the outcome of their tainted natures, and the characters she chooses for presentation are abnormal. Even the little maid-of-all-work is so morbid that she turns her back on the company she is supposed to serve, because it revolts her to see people eat. Vashti, who has been daintily bred, takes joyful refuge in the dirt and squalor of an old gipsy woman's hut, and lives there until she is thrown out after a degrading fight with a ruffian called Micah Vision. As you read, you want to know what happens to her, but you feel that she is hardly fit to be at large; and when she marries Ambrose Bellchamber you watch two rudderless boats set out to encounter the storms of life. Their wreck is a foregone conclusion, and your reflection as you end their history is that no one will miss them much.

Showing the White Feather. By M. HARDING KELLEY.
(Drane, 3s. 6d.)

THIS is a sentimental little story "faithfully inscribed" by the author "to all those of my countrymen who fought, or fell, in bringing protection and justice to the dark races of our South African dominions." The plot need not be related here. Suffice it that there is a pleasant sort of sentimental hero, Charlie Addison, who enlists, and kills a man in a brawl, and deserts and goes to South Africa. There is a pleasant sort of sentimental little body called Janie, who falls in love with Charlie, and has love-light in her eyes, and also, incidentally, says "all right," which Mr. Kelley (or is it Miss?) spells as one word. There is a person named Christian Coutts who is not a Christian at all, but a wicked treacherous Boer, who conceals an important letter from Charlie to Janie, and makes love to the lady himself. And there is a sentimental little Zulu boy who drops on his knees in the dusty road, and gently raising his mistress's hand to his lips, stammers that he lubs her and will serb her faithful till he die. These and other pleasant people circulate in an atmosphere of sentiment flavoured with fighting and with one tragedy which, however, vanishes before the honeyed sweetness that gets the upper hand in the last chapter.

FINE ART

OLD ENGLISH PORCELAINS

THE porcelains of England are now mechanically perfect; a prosperous and monotonous precision is the chief character of the work, and the old accidents and personal qualities are lost for ever. But to those lovers of romance and the happy chance, whose temperament and environment have made them collectors, English ceramics of the eighteenth century offer a charmed field of research and a profitable mine of discovery. For in the days when all Europe was searching for the secret of Chinese porcelain, and, later, when Böttger, under the Elector of Saxony, established the parent factory at Meissen, and a little after that when some of the arcanists from that centre had stolen away with more or less of the secrets of the pottery and a dozen new establishments sprang up in Germany, the adventurers of this art in England were prodigiously busy. It is thanks to the efforts of various individuals and not to a wealthy patron, as on the Continent, that the china-ware of this country is so especially interesting. Each man and each factory had its own way of working, and though the whole affair, from the composition of the material to the last item of decoration, was imitative, these men and societies managed to impress their personality upon their work in a way which will always remain a guide to the student of the subject and a source of interest to the technologist.

A few years ago there was a competition among all the leading porcelain factories of Europe as to which of them should receive an order for a vast quantity of table service and the like for the White House at Washington. The English firm of Messrs. Wedgwood won in the open competition, and might have reminded the world that they have been accustomed to lead in regard to earthenwares and, later, porcelains—as now made—for more than a century. It is rather to the skill and energy of such commercial houses as these that England owes her porcelains than to the patronage of princes and the interest of, say, the Pompadour, or those

"Courtiers as butterflies bright, Beauties that Fragonard drew," whose taste, in France especially, did so much for the applied arts of their country. Our native factories, no doubt assisted in the earliest days by workmen from abroad, received some little patronage under George III. and at least one of his sons, but were mainly the private speculation of skilful and often enthusiastic potters. To the many collectors who wisely desire to increase their knowledge of this subject no more interesting or valuable work could be found than the finely illustrated catalogue of the English porcelain in the British Museum, in which the informed introduction and clear descriptions of specimens are admirably written by Mr. R. L. Hobson, an assistant in the department for which the late Sir Augustus Wallaston Franks did such great archæologic service. In regard to the æsthetic side of the matter, our regret is that the subject has been treated rather more upon the lines of a science of antiquities than as a liberal art of yesterday. But we must admit that the beauties of English porcelain are rather to be found in its technical qualities than in the general effect of any piece or service. It is true that in the earliest days, when the Chinese and Japanese influence was paramount, many excellent designs were well copied; but more frequently the original drawings were disfigured and vulgarised by the reproducer until the uninformed might suppose that the characteristics of Oriental work were bad drawing and ineffective composition. With the foundation of the potteries near London, Bow, Chelsea, and—there is ample reason for supposing—some half-dozen others, such as Stepney, Greenwich, Stratford, and so forth, the styles in fashion in Germany and France were largely copied, and a lightness and brightness belonged to this period which can hardly be said to be in any sense native. The gaiety of the early work from Chelsea and Bow, the lavish decoration of Worcester and Derby wares, were owing to Continental inspiration, and the only really original departure which England made was the useful invention of transfer designs which could be printed on round surfaces, thus dispensing with the manual work of the often incompetent, or, if gifted, over-elaborate, decorator. For although the European potters had copied so much Oriental work, they had never grasped the essentials of Eastern decoration and were content to affix to china-ware an infinite quantity of elegant miniature painting which, good of its kind, was absolutely ineffective for the purpose of ornamenting the object on which it appeared. Remembering the admiration shown by all Europe during the eighteenth century for Chinese wares, it is extraordinary how little the spirit of Celestial art was captured by the Western potters. You will find a few pieces of early Vincennes, Chantilly, or St. Cloud almost entirely Chinese in style, and some Chelsea, Worcester and Bow of the first days is true to the feeling of the original; but no sooner were the British porcelain makers accustomed to their art than they produced, at Caughley in 1780, the horrors of the "Willow Pattern," which at once took the imagination of an uninformed and uncultivated people. This design, an insult alike to its Oriental origin and to the taste of the English people, is a fair example of native inspiration. It, and the transfer printing, are the two things that English skill and invention have added to the decoration of porcelain. In regard to its manufacture our labours have been infinitely greater and more valuable.

The examples of English work at the British Museum, and therefore the lists and illustrations in the catalogue before us, begin with the pottery of Bow, which was founded in 1745, if not earlier, and go on to Chelsea, probably of the same date, and so on to the Chelsea-Derby and to Derby and Worcester, thence to the Salopian, Plymouth, Bristol, Nantgarw, and Swansea, to Liverpool, Lowestoft, Pinxton, Rockingham, Isleworth, and the various makers of Staffordshire porcelain.

In each of these divisions are many excellent examples, the more important of which are illustrated in this volume. Each manufactory, or group of potteries, is introduced with a short and clear history of its past, which, in the case of Lowestoft, contains some interesting particulars of the more recent discoveries in regard to that once mythical and always much traded upon and maligned pottery. As with the catalogue of earthenware and stoneware, published some two years ago, the present volume concludes with some twenty plates of photographic reproductions—often in colour—of the best pieces in the collection. Among these the most distinguished are the early Chelsea and Bow figures and the Chelsea-Derby of George III.'s time.

So fully and well has Mr. Hobson done his work that this catalogue may be said to be an invaluable vade mecum to those who are starting on the quest of what is best and historically most interesting in English porcelain; its study should be followed by the works of Mr. Burton and Mr. Solon on the same subject, to which the cataloguer is indebted for many interesting points.

ART SALES

PERHAPS the most important "lot" among Art Sales last week was a biberon carved of rock crystal and mounted with enamelled gold. The property of Mr. Gabbinas, the biberon changed hands at Messrs. Christie's at 15,500 guineas, Mr. C. J. Wertheimer being the purchaser.

On the continuation of the sale of the collection of Mr. Louis Huth some choice Early English silver was sold. A James I. rose-water ewer and dish, both of parcel-gilt, embossed and chased in bands with dolphins in oval panels and groups of fruit, fell to Messrs. Crichton at £4050. A William and Mary standing cup and cover realised £3300 (Noble); a plain tankard and cover presented by Queen Mary to Simon Janzen in recognition of his conveyance of the King to the Hague, £2050; a James I. tankard and cover, £1720; an Elizabethan tankard and cover, £1700. Two James I. standing-cups and covers in silver-gilt, the property of Lord Montagu of Beaulieu, realised £1600 and £1350 respectively (Mr. Letts).

A number of modern pictures and water-colour drawings from several collections were disposed of on Saturday by Messrs. Christie. "Loch Lochy Castle," by Sam Bough, realised 250 guineas (Davidson); "The King of Hearts," by W. Holman Hunt, 210 guineas (C. Davis); "The Guards' Cheer," Crimean veterans of the Guards cheering Queen Victoria during the Diamond Jubilee procession, 250 guineas (Waller).

The Gabbinas sale was continued on Tuesday, when one or two engravings fetched good prices: Lady Hamilton as Nature, after Romney, by H. Meyer, first published state, 330 gs.; Lady Harriet Herbert, after Reynolds, by Valentine Green, etched letter proof, 295 gs.; "St. James's Park" and "A Tea-garden" after Morland, proof before the borders printed in colours, 175 gs.; Mrs. Pelham feeding chickens, after Reynolds, by W. Dickinson, 170 gs.; the Daughter of Sir T. Frankland, after Hoppner, by W. Ward, second published state, 150 gs.; and Miss Cumberland, after Romney, by J. R. Smith, with Smith's address, 100 gs. All these fell to Messrs. Colnaghi. Whistler's "Pierrot" fell to the same firm for 70 gs., and the sixteen "Scenes on the Thames" were bought by Mr. Dunthorne for 50 gs. Mr. Kennedy secured Seymour Haden's "Sunset in Ireland," a bargain at 26 gs., and Messrs. Colnaghi bought the first state of Méryon's "La Pompe Notre-Dame" for 31 gs.

"HAWTHORNE, U.S.A.," AT THE IMPERIAL THEATRE

Hawthorne, U.S.A., produced by Mr. Lewis Waller at the Imperial, leaves the case of Mr. Fagan very much as it stood. The germ of all good drama is not, as is commonly supposed, a story or an incident, but an idea which informs the whole and to the demonstration of which else is sacrificed. Mr. Fagan has ideas, many and large, but he is no judge of their relative values, and does not know what to make of them. He is like the navvies who recently made ducks and drakes of spade guineas. Prayer of the Sword opened with fine promise. On the one hand a life of cloistered prayer, on the other a life of vigorous action. Having apparently given out his work, Mr. Fagan was soon floundering in a discourse so rambling and irrelevant that he seemed to have forgotten that he ever had a text. He rapidly enveloped us in a maelstrom in which anything might happen, and a great deal did. It is much the same with Hawthorne, U.S.A. The idea of Hawthorne with his 200,000,000 dollars is as much more real a king as the panic-stricken monarch of banister Borrovina is big, simple, and worth pondering over. But Mr. Fagan stuck to that idea and staked his whole play on it he might have achieved notable results. It was open to him to bring home to the proud princess the fact that Hawthorne had as many subjects as had her craven father and that though he wore no crown and they would not know him if they met him in the street, his sovereignty was the more real. But all Mr. Fagan gets out of the idea is one rather ornate harangue, the rest of the play being a mélange of inconceivable misunderstandings of no moment, of motor-car accidents, of windfalls, and of a futile and unimpressive revolution as ever we saw, and all the rebels demand is their wages and these Hawthorne is ready to give them. Had Mr. Fagan followed up his idea in true dramatic style, we should not have had a four acts in what may be called the Anthony Hope country; an act or two would have passed in Goldenrod where the princess might have seen Hawthorne's sovereignty at work for herself. Mr. Fagan's determination to write a "light play" (vide programme) has resulted in his writing a very dark one, so dark indeed that at times it is not easy to discern what it is all about. The ferocity of the revolutionaries seems to be as formal and as gratuitous as the hostility of Tweedledum and Tweedledee. All they want is their money, and there it is for them. Mr. Lewis Waller as the man of millions is dashing and débonnaire, and sports, when it suits him, a very American accent. Miss Evelyn Millard makes a very pretty princess, and Mr. H. V. Esmond depicts the craven agonies of a monarch apprehensive of immediate assassination. His is a very powerful performance, but whether it is in good taste is a question. The piece is beautifully mounted and may please the uncritical public, which, after all, is the only public worth considering.

SCIENCE

THE SCIENTIFIC SPIRIT

THE scientific spirit—as, in accordance with etymology, I conceive it—may most properly and briefly be defined as the spirit in which, and in virtue of which, men seek to know. It needs no further qualification; the verb may be used intransitively. Not this nor that nor any other order of knowledge is indicated; but all that can, may or might conceivably be known; all that may be matter of knowledge. In the words of Professor W. K. Clifford: "All facts belong to science and are her portion for ever." Whatever can be conceived as matter of knowledge is proper subject-er for science, which is none other than organised ledge. Any fact of astronomy or literature or logic eology—such as that the earth moves, or that in such such an era such and such a man asserted or denied the earth moves—is fit matter for science. The se “scientific fact” is, properly speaking, pleonastic; acts are, and must be, scientific. The reader does not to be reminded of the phrase, sanctioned by long and oritative usage, “theological science”; nor is any ptional knowledge of Greek required to translate such tly parallel terms as geology and theology.

much being postulated, we are prepared to discuss spirit in which, and in virtue of which, men seek to know tever is or may be matter of knowledge; such as the of the moon, the knowing process, or the history of the anasian Creed. Having clearly stated what is meant he adjective of our title, we must inquire into the actors of the spirit or temper thus designated. What is ideal concept—realised in such conspicuous instances Berkeley and Darwin, unrealised in instances too entably numerous—which we assert to indicate the it proper to those who seek knowledge and, through wledge, wisdom?

he first characteristic of the scientific spirit, as I see it, ne possession of a certain faith. (I do not use the word hat I regard as the grossly false sense of an antithesis eason.) This is the faith that the distinction between th and Falsehood is not rhetorical or personal, or hropic, as in the saying of Protagoras that man is the asure of all things. It is the faith that certain things and are as they are, whether or no men find them so, ether or no it is possible for men to find them so, ether or no there be men at all to find them so. In er words, the first and essential characteristic of the entific spirit is an implicit, and when necessary an plicit, denial of the contention that there is no such ng as objective truth.

This characteristic is intellectual, and, as far as I can , is the only essential characteristic of the scientific rit that belongs to this category. The others are moral. In discussing them, I will endeavour to confine myself essentials. Assiduity, patience, courage, are great aids him who seeks knowledge: but they cannot be regarded essentials of the scientific spirit, as is evident from the ct that they are merely comparative terms. Precious ough patience be, a man may inquire in the scientific rit for five minutes as truly as for fifty years.

But one of the essential moral ingredients of the scien- fic spirit I take to be a love of knowledge greater than un be accounted for by desire of fame. I purposely frame his assertion so as to avoid saying what I do not mean to ay, that the desire for fame must not occur amongst the eaker's motives. Cases there have been where the desire id not occur, but it is impossible to regard its absence as n essential. On the other hand, I would deny the scien- fic spirit to him who had no measure of love for truth, ave as a means to personal ends. Such an one could not properly be said to love truth; and I take it that some easure of this unselfish affection is a necessary part of the cientific spirit. Further, I would distinguish this love, hich I have ventured to call moral, from mere curiosity, hich is non-moral. In other words, I will venture to say hat there is a religious element in the scientific spirit, as I nceive it; that is to say, that he who possesses it com- ports himself with some measure of reverence and affection n his search for truth.

If this be his attitude, the seeker will necessarily believe hat whatever knowledge he may obtain is worth having; hich is, indeed, to say that he will regard it as, in the highest sense, useful. Yet, in full remembrance of this assertion, I would maintain that an essential ingredient of the scientific spirit is the unqualified repudiation not only of any so-called utilitarian motive, but also of the need of any such motive as excusing the search for truth. This must be insisted upon to the utmost. But I will insist upon it b including it in a much more comprehensive proposition, which is that the scientific spirit recks naught of consequences. It cares not, in its own proper and necessary character—which is not to say that he whom it informs is not a man, with a man's hopes and fears—whether a truth be what we call useful, or what we call useless; whether it be beautiful or unbeautiful; whether it shall shake empires or churches, or shall be utterly unnoted of men; whether it shall rob him who seeks it of his heart's ease and make a goblin of the sun, or shall wipe all tears from his eyes for ever. Careless of all these consequences of the truth, this spirit cares only to know that it is true.

And now, after this most inadequate account of the scientific spirit, let us compare it with certain other tempers in which men may approach facts. My intention is not to compare it with the spirit of “utilitarianism,” or with the spirit of bias, or with that which says: “My country, right or wrong!” or with that which exclaims: “What I have said, I have said,” and will suppress inconvenient facts—the spirit of consistency which Emerson trounced. These negations of the scientific spirit are already defined by exclusion. But let us observe that whilst all facts whatsoever may, and on occasion must, be approached in the scientific spirit, certain facts and experiences (which are facts of experience) must also be otherwise approached by any but a Professor Dryasdust. For instance:

The hearing of the prelude to Tristan und Isolde is a fact of experience. This also must therefore be approached in the scientific spirit. I have tried so to approach it several times, but will not again. I have read the score as I listened, and have attempted to understand the construction of the piece, the modulations, the principles of the orchestration, and so forth. Also I have attempted to analyse my sensations, to ask myself why this phrase thrills my spine, or why it does so on one occasion but not on another. Candidly, this is all very well, but it mightily interferes with one's enjoyment. Now the scientific spirit is that in which men seek to know. But, primarily, I go to the opera seeking not to know but to feel; and I find that the assumption of the scientific spirit is incompatible with the full sway of the æsthetic spirit. Henceforth I go without the score, say au revoir to physiological psychology when Richter raises his stick, and approach the facts in the æsthetic spirit, the spirit in which men seek to feel.

MUSIC

NATIONAL MUSIC

MUSIC's real principle of life lies in its being national music—literally the voice and expression of the people in whose midst it springs.

This conviction prompted Wagner's famous article on “Judaism in Art,” wherein he contended that, music being essentially a thing of national growth, it was impossible for an expatriated and wandering race to produce work that should endure. And descending the scale of civilisation from Wagner to primitive peoples, we find that each tribe has chants and instruments whose combination is peculiar to itself and characteristic of its criticism of life, limited though this may be; and from their chants and instruments these peoples evolve sounds which, however rude, are coherent, and provocative of the passions and emotions by which such elementary beings can be swayed. No musical pilgrim among primitive peoples would confound, let us say, a Maori dirge with a Zulu lament, any more than we should attribute a Hungarian Rhapsody to Chopin, or suppose Liszt to have composed the fifty-two Polish Mazurkas.

Hundreds of years before Liszt laid the glamour of his own personality and his own setting on Czardás and Friska, this wild and spirited music had been the ultimate expression of the whole Hungarian nation. Not a village in Hungary to this day but has its band of melody-makers, who without notes, and upon the rudest instruments, at bridal or funeral, church-festival, dance by moonlight, or harvest-home, throw themselves as one man into strains that ravish the listener's heart. It is not the village band that plays, it is the national voice that sings. It is memory, tradition, aspiration—all the fire of a tameless race—which make strings and heart-strings, when played on thus, quiver alike. To this music did bygone generations languish and make love, fight and toil and dance; to this music will their children in turn be led. By its music, in fact, does each nation reveal itself. Typical composers of any land speak to us less of their own individuality than of their country's. Thus the simplicity of wild Scandinavia breathes through Grieg's artless strains; thus does Tchaikowski bring all Russia before us. The Russians are fatalists, as well they may be, and to the pitch of fatalism their music is tuned. Impressions of menace, of sadness, underlie "sounds of revelry by night." The dance is a dance of death, the march the mighty tread of an oppressed people tramping sullenly to its doom, the song the endless song of the unsatisfied heart, of the forlorn hope. The whole inspiration flows like that mythical stream in "Khubla Khan":

"Where Alph the sacred river ran Through caverns measureless to man
Down to a sunless sea."

Compare with Chopin, who holds up the mirror to Poland. Could the characteristics proper to this most heroic, most unhappy nation be ever finally absorbed and obliterated by the countries to whom she has fallen a prey, one glance at a score of Chopin's would reveal herself to herself again as clearly as Narcissus saw his limbs reflected in the woodland pool.

"Will no one tell me what she sings?"

cries Wordsworth of his Solitary Reaper. And then the poet answers himself:

"Perhaps the plaintive numbers flow
For old, unhappy, far-off things,
And battles long ago."

Such is the loneliness of Poland, and such her song. Every nation, in fact, has or ought to have a voice of its own, a music of its own, typical of its experiences, with a movement, a sentiment and a colour peculiar to itself; and these characteristics, while capable of being enriched and elevated, cannot be thrust out of it by intellectual development. "Le style," said a French writer, "fait pour les œuvres ce que fait le sucre pour les fruits—cela conserve."

During the past month we have had ample opportunity of comparing and criticising various examples of national music in our midst. The month of May has twice given Wagner's famous cycle to the public; once Elgar's Dream of Gerontius, once a Welsh rhapsody by Edward German. Of the nationality of Wagner's music there can be no doubt. Could any exile from Germany listen without emotion to the opening strains of the Rheingold? It is the Rhine—not the Thames, or any other river—flowing between her banks with their wreaths of legends, her rocks crowned with romance, her vineyards and woods—"der alte Märchenwald" that Heine loved—flowing through his heart! The nymphs are German, so are the dwarfs, the giants, the gods, the voices, the feelings—if we perhaps except Wotan's willingness to exchange a relation-in-law for a castle, which might be a sentiment not foreign to any nation. The music, whose roots lie hidden in the "Sing-spiel" of olden days, is the culmination of musical thought and musical lore in Germany, and has become to her people as sacred as religion. We have yet in England to produce a composer who shall express us in the same way. Opera and oratorio cannot of course be truthfully compared. It may also be said of Sir Edward Elgar that his Dream of Gerontius, a purely spiritual poem, demands a purely spiritual atmosphere, belonging to no country in particular, but to those heights of imagination common to all, wherefrom Beethoven composed what Mr. Hadow felicitously calls "the white Alpine sublimity of his mass in D." Perhaps but is Sir Edward Elgar distinctively English in his great works? Can they be called National Music?

Most of the musicians of this country compose with brain only. We speak here of serious musicians: Smithlein and Joneschen, men who, after a year's foreign conservatoires produce—what? "Die wundergewaltige melodei, wovon die alte Kuh gestorben ist."

And no wonder. But John Bull is perplexed. He vaguely the intended compliment to himself, is aware that though the voice may be the voice of the sentiment is the sentiment of Heinrich; and he takes it as he resents the advent of any other cheap brain-stuff "made in Germany" and dumped upon our ears. Mr. German's Welsh rhapsody is a step in the right direction; it is fresh, stirring and vigorous. But we have not yet, as a nation, arrived at that conscious felicity of expression which distinguishes our art. Without temperament, in a word, the greatest musical counterpoint falls short of immortality. It is temperament which makes of an elaborate orchestral score less a set of mathematical problems resolved to the composer's satisfaction than the inevitable onward sweep of thought and feeling combined, into which all beautifying accessories flow as easily as tributary streams into the main rushing towards the sea. It is temperament which prompts the spontaneous lyrical and heroic cry of a people. Now, that we have abundance of temperament proved by our groups of ballads and national melodies—Scotch, Irish, and Welsh—than which no country produced hardier or lovelier wildflowers. But they bloom close to the soil. In the higher, more cultivated regions of composition, emotion, and consequently expression, unaccountably fail. One element is missing in the trinity in unity without which no spiritual relation is complete.

Up to this our country has musically proved her barren mother; and the effort to import foreign music and foreign inspiration has been, as the angry Greek chants in the Trojan Women:

"An home-coming that striveth ever more
And never cometh home—"

Home, that is to say, to the hearts of her people. There rises up a composer in our midst, who shall be "bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh," England, with all her singing birds in her heart and her eye-visions, sits in "cradle of the rude imperious surge," rocked by unnumbered tides, and yet remains dumb.

CORRESPONDENCE

WHAT IS AN ELEGY?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Chiefly, I think, because of its large and persistent success regarding the people's "split infinitives" the Daily Chronicle has achieved a certain reputation as a literary authority. Some chance, therefore, attaches to its critical dicta. In the issue of Saturday last that paper observes, in its most serenely dogmatic manner, that Gray's "Elegy" is "practically the only elegy in the language." Now the general impression is that the language is singularly barren in elegies, the finest of which are the "Lycidas" of Milton, "Adonais" of Shelley, the "Ave Atque Vale" of Swinburne. Gray's immortal composition, in spite of its title, is not an elegy. One naturally submits the question to the ACADEMY—a Court of Appeal, where the judgment of the Court below is open to challenge.

May 31.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

[Both our contemporary and our correspondent are very severe in their assertions. Judged by the recognised standards, Gray's Elegy is truly elegiac, even though it laments a class rather than an individual; but to say that it is the only elegy in our language is absurd.—Ed.]

ART AND MORALITY

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—With your permission I hope next week to continue the discussion to which Mr. Davies and Mr. Tilney have contributed. However, may I make a brief comment on Mr. Tilney's description of many burglars and murderers as "consummate artists"? I am ainted with De Quincey's Essay on murder considered as one of the arts (it is included in a volume which, with a singular sense of humour, was awarded to me as a schoolboy); but I venture, nevertheless, to protest against what is surely an undesirable extension of the meaning of a word which stands to me for a definite idea. If, however, despite the Johnsonian condemnation of punning, we must play and-loose with terms, I would suggest that the more applicable would be not artists but scientists. It would be possible, I think, to write an essay on murder considered as applied science. In thus writing to amend Mr. Tilney's phrase, I shall at least be acquitted of bias!

C. W. SALEEBY.

GEORGE BUCHANAN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The mention of George Buchanan in your issue of last week calls a curious popular error, prevalent in Scotland. It is commonly believed that Buchanan was the Court jester of James the First of Scotland and Sixth of England. Many years ago, when I visited Edinburgh, the birth-place of Buchanan, his monument was pointed out to me as that of "George Buchanan, the King's fool." Even so learned an antiquarian as Charles Kirkpatrick Sharpe fell into the common error. In his edition of the "Household Book of the Countess of Mar," speaking of King James' fools, he says that they were David Monmouth and Archie Armstrong and that vulgar tradition classed George Buchanan along with them.

My mistake arose through confusing the historian with another quite different George Buchanan. The latter was jester to James I. and his adventures were the subject of a popular chap-book entitled "The Witty and Entertaining Exploits of George Buchanan, who was commonly called The King's Fool." The notion arose that the scholar and the jester were identical—a belief still widely held in Scotland. It was the jester that Caleb Balderstone referred to, when he speaks of the loss of their dinner, making Sir William Ashton and his daughter Lucy "as merry as if it were the best jeest in a' George Buchanan."

MRS. BROWNING'S BIRTH

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your remarks in reference to Mrs. Browning you give an incorrect version of Mr. Browning's statement. In the Prefatory Note to his wife's works, dated December 10, 1887, correcting "mistakenly mis-stated" passages in Mr. Ingram's biography, he states: "Elizabeth was born, March 6, 1806, at Coxhoe Hall, County of Durham, the residence of her father," and in a foot-note thereto, the entry from the Parish Register of Kelloe Church is given. This, I should judge, is conclusive.

THE BROOK

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I notice that in an interesting paragraph in this week's ACADEMY you repeat the old popular delusion that Tennyson's poem "The Brook" was inspired by the stream that flows by the historic home at Somersby.

This is not so, nor was the poem inspired by any particular stream. It was purely imaginary, as Lord Tennyson tells us in his most exhaustive biography of the poet, and this, you will admit, is about the best authority obtainable.

As a matter of fact it was the poem "Flow down, cold rivulet, to the sea" which Tennyson dedicated to the Somersby stream.

May 25.

W. SWAYNE LITTLE.

[Our correspondent thinks in a somewhat confused manner. A beautiful stream might at the same time be "purely imaginary" and yet be all that we said, "inspired by a particular stream." Let him read "The Brook" again and observe how all its characteristics belong to purely lowland country whereas that of Burns, which it follows in many respects so closely, belongs to the mountains, and he will probably revise his opinion.—Ed.]

CRESCENT AND STAR

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In reply to the question that Mr. Wallis puts me, I would say I am not at all sure that the star I saw followed the moon, but only that it did not, for the rest of the evening, get out of her neighbourhood. It may have been emerging just after the occultation, when my father first saw it and called us out to look at it. Certain it is that when I read the "Ancient Mariner" I instantly recognised the scene he describes.

Others again join me in thanking Mr. Wallis for his patience and courtesy.

THE BOOKSHELF

live Art in Egypt, by Jean Capart. H. Grevel & Co., 16s. net. The problem presented by the remarkably high level of Egyptian production at a time long anterior to that of the emergence of the modern nations from barbarism, has long eluded solution, there has been no reliable data upon which to found a theory of development. Until quite recently no tokens had been discovered of an archaic answer to that of Greece, and it seemed impossible to evade the conclusion that the art of Egypt, like the Goddess of Wisdom, was mature. To assume, as did certain scholars, that the æsthetic sense of the dwellers on the Nile was derived from the influx of conquerors of a more advanced civilisation than their own, does but give the form of the riddle, no one being able to say who these conquerors were or whence they came. As is pointed out, however, by the learned curator of the Royal Brussels Museum, in the exhaustive and richly illustrated monograph just published, which has been ably translated by Miss Griffith, a series of important discoveries has of late been made, throwing real light upon the vexed question and completely changing the current of research. In 1873 Dr. Flinders Petrie, whose archaeological acumen is unrivalled, dug up at Koptos the roughly carved statues of the god Min, on which were cut in low relief certain crude figures of animals and the name of the deity in archaic hieroglyphics. A year later the same excavator, aided by Mr. Quibell, came upon a yet more important find: a vast prehistoric Necropolis, rich in just such relics of primitive civilisation as hitherto evaded the most rigorous search. During the succeeding years similar discoveries were made elsewhere, which culminated in 1913 in the bringing to light at Abydos of a complete prehistoric town, which was at once hailed as the long missing link between primitive and historic Egypt. Having made his readers fully acquainted with the actual state of these facts on the problem they have so greatly aided in solving, M. Capart proceeds to examine most minutely the various objects unearthed, making each contribute in turn to the long chain of evidence, proving that there was, after all, no such great difference between the Egyptians and the other primitive races of the earth. Beginning with personal adornment, this most scholarly and eloquent author calls up many a vivid picture of the Egyptian beaux and belles of prehistoric days, passing thence to the consideration of the decoration of their homes, their domestic utensils, their tools and weapons, their pottery and furniture, their sculpture and painting, skilfully bringing every detail, however apparently trivial, into the wonderful harmony of the civilisation that preceded the Egypt of the Pharaohs. The last chapters of this deeply interesting book are devoted to the consideration of the earliest Pharaonic monuments, the Dancing, Music and Poetry of the prehistoric Egyptians, and to a summary of the ethnological and æsthetic results of the recent discoveries, the author closing his work with the expression of a hope that the materials he has brought to the foot of the scaffold of archaeological knowledge may some day be utilised by an architect of genius in building up a splendid palace, a remark in which he does scant justice to the importance of his own work.

The Japanese Spirit, by Y. Okakura. Constable, 3s. 6d. net.—"Blue eyes and blonde hair, the charms of which we first learn to feel after a protracted stay among you, are regarded in a Japanese as something extraordinary in no favourable sense of the term. A girl with even a slight tendency to grey eyes or frizzly hair is looked upon as an unbecoming deviation from the national type." These words of Mr. Okakura, the author of the "Japanese Spirit," give us perhaps as well as anything else a notion of the vast difference between Japanese and European ideals, not only in toilet but through the whole gamut of civilisation. The unusual is rarely the beautiful in Japan. It is the variation on the time-honoured theme that is prized, and yet within these limits how much have we to learn! Surely no modern people as ever come nearer to certain of the Greek ideals, the love of art without ostentation, the cult of the mean, the reverence for simplicity. The whole nation is permeated by them. The very ricksha men often spend their leisure in making poetry. Imagine the average London cabbie engaged in the same pursuit! Mr. Okakura compares the Japanese and the European drawing-room, the one with its suggestion of the House Beautiful and the other stocked and packed like a museum, with all its goods, so to say, thrust into the shop-window. No wonder Japanese find such an arrangement "revolting." What are our Primrose and Shamrock Days compared with the Japanese worship of the cherry-blossom? What is our love of nature, with pigeon-shooting at one end and railways up Snowdon at the other, compared with the Japanese passionate love of land and landscape? We have divorced manners from morals and further fossilised them into deportment and etiquette, bringing the whole thing down to the level of the marionette. In Japan manners and morals are inextricably entwined, and the mere act of arranging flowers as taught to girls is full of moral beauty. The average individual in Europe is a quick-change artist in manners and morals. With the Japanese consistency in behaviour is everything. Thanks to Bushido he learns to preserve not merely "æquam mentem," but an impeturbable suavity. Taking his obligation to the past as his central dogma, he lays all religions under contribution, even Christianity, whose doctrines of love and truth he deeply admires, though he thinks little of the missionary who declares it imperative to eat it "off a particular dish." Conduct with him is even more than three-fourths of life, and dogma, from whatever source he borrows it, is in his eyes but a convenient summary of what he has already put to the test in action.

Animals I have Known, by Arthur H. Beavan. Unwin, 5s.—Mr.

Arthur H. Beavan is one of those men who seem to write because it is the usual thing for those who know a little and believe that any one can write prose, to produce at least one book. He claims to have been a great traveller, and he writes of animals in many parts of England, in Australia, Peru, the River Plate, and Brazil; and although he shows signs of being neither an accomplished naturalist nor a lover of animals, yet somehow he has been much among animals and has taken notes; and we see that he has already written on "Animals I have Known" and "Marlborough House and its Occupants." When we add that he writes his mother tongue as the majority speak it, though not so forcibly, and that he has no sense of order, it should be clear that his task of making a good book is a hard one and his undertaking it heroic. In our opinion he fails, and we think that any success he may have will be due to the multiplication and overlapping of books that makes choice very difficult, with the result that some who know little of animals and want to read about them, may come for the first time upon what they want in Mr. Beavan's book. For it goes without saying that he gives some information. Take, for example, his chapter on the badger, which begins: "The badger is associated by me chiefly with the operation of shaving . . ."; that is his way. He repeats much book knowledge, as that the badger is a plantigrade, that the old name for it was brock, and that it used to be believed that the legs on one side of it were shorter than those on the other. To these he adds that the badger abounds in Cornwall; that it is very strong, and that he and a friend who seized the tail of one could not pull it out of a hole; that it does not smell unpleasantly; that badger-baiting was cruel and cowardly; that he himself once caught two in a stout sack fastened at the mouth of a hole, and sent them to "one of the Australian Zoological Societies." This appeals to the very slightly informed and to those with mild sporting instincts who are not sportsmen. The other chapters are of the same kind, except that, in that on the hare, he quotes from "Struwpeter." Here and there he tells his own adventures, which are poor and poorly told, and often full of a very stupid brutality. He tells us of a schoolfellow who, on a payment of a penny, would guillotine rats "in a large lavatory." His humour is debased, and his long, jaunty manner ineffectual. His illustrations vary in merit, but there can be no doubt that in drawing a badly-stuffed fox's mask and calling it a fox is no merit at all.

Mr. Cecil J. Sharp, of the Hampstead Conservatoire of Music, has edited a new number of the Folk-Song Society's Journal, beginning Vol. II. (Journal of the Folk-Song Society, No. 6). Ill-fortune attended the Society in the long illness and death of the enthusiastic Hon. Sec., Mrs. Kate Lee, which delayed and nearly stopped the publications; a worthy successor has been found in Miss Lucy Broadwood, and all now promises well for steady continuance in the praiseworthy task of hunting out and preserving traditional songs and tunes. A selection of the Somersetshire findings appears in this number. Thirty-two are included, some in several versions. Practical musicians have only too much reason to know how the same piece of music, even when played from fixed notation, will be distorted by different performers; and when tunes are learnt by ear during childhood, the distortion becomes extraordinary after a lifetime. To keep definite rhythm is an almost impossible task for the untrained, and street musicians may commonly be heard playing or singing a familiar hymn-tune out of time. Triple measure offers particular difficulty; we have repeatedly heard seven lines of a stanza rendered correctly, but the other in duple measure. The pitch of the notes will vary also; and thus arise the "versions." These Somersetshire ballads have slight literary value; as music they are always interesting, and often beautiful. We are glad to see that each ballad is made the subject of notes by folk-loreists from other parts of England, including Mr. Frank Kidson, of Leeds. In attacking so extensive and hard a subject, the word must be Divide et impera.

Surprise was once expressed to a prominent Irish Member of Tammany that he should contemplate spending a holiday in Ireland. "Best spot in the world," was his reply—"the only one where the Irishman lives and doesn't govern!" Mr. Geen would, we fancy, agree with this gentleman in his conclusion if not in the reason given for it, for in his book with the somewhat cumbersome title, What I have seen while fishing and how I caught my fish (Unwin, 7s. 6d.), he devotes chapter after chapter to Ireland and its people, and his observations show that he has never lost an opportunity of penetrating that cloak of good-humoured, if at times slightly sarcastic, blarney under which an Irishman delights to hide his real self, and which has, perhaps, more than anything, contributed to the mystification of the inquiring Saxon. The old wife's words to him: "May we be preserved from getting all we ask!" are as striking as they are pregnant with suggestion for all students of the much vexed problem of the condition of things in the sister Isle. He tells a witty story, which a certain class of English tourist would do well to take to heart, of a party who had been talking loudly in a railway carriage of the "dirty Irish," and announcing their determination to spend their next holiday in Wales, but were dissuaded from that by an old Irishwoman, who warned them they would find Irish there too, and ended her advice by the recommendation: "Go to Hell for your next holiday; ye'll find no dirty Irish there." From Ireland he takes the reader to Scotland and the Lynn, and finishes up by descriptions of the coarse fishing to be had within easy distance of town. He ranks the pollack very high in the list of game fish for its fighting qualities; and in this he is justified, for it is almost a question with some fishermen whether any rod and line tackle is made that the larger pollack will not break in their plunging dive for the weed-beds. The writing of this book has evidently been a labour of love on the part of the author, and the photographs will be of interest to those who know the localities they depict.

ATHENÆUM: "We welcome Mr. Lucy's most entertaining volume, which also yields some of the most admirable of the caricatures of 'F.C.G.'"

DAILY EXPRESS: "Mr. Lucy gossips with pleasant reminiscence and interesting observation of the men and events in Parliament in the Sessions of 1896-1902. . . . Mr. Lucy's amusing chat is illustrated by many inimitable drawings by Mr. Carruthers Gould, and the whole book is admirably entertaining."

DAILY CHRONICLE: "He (Mr. Lucy) has become a depository of Parliamentary stories gathered from men on all sides of the House, and he tells them in a manner which furnishes us with very pleasant reading."

BRITISH WEEKLY: "There is no describer of Parliament nearly equal to Mr. Lucy at his best. . . . Mr. Lucy is altogether unrivalled in his knowledge of the facts that underlie every Parliamentary situation."

SCOTSMAN: "Mr. Lucy does not confine himself to what passes within the precincts of Westminster or to the period covered by his book. He utilises good material wherever he finds it."

Romances from Wagner's Operas.

It is a remarkable thing how ignorant even genuinely musical people are of the plots of their favourite operas. Ask any of your Wagner-loving friends to tell you the story of "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," not to speak of the "Ring," and you will find more than one in fifty will be able to tell you the details of the plots or the music, even when they are familiar with every note of the music. Hence the necessity of these works, which are novelised versions of Wagner's grand plots, and of great value to English literature.

question that young writers of genius ought to consider at the present moment is whether or no it is possible to invent a new form of novel. The flatness characteristic of this class of composition to-day is undeniable, and so kneaded has the writing of novels become that it is a barrenness to begin again to tread one of the old paths. The tribe of novelists has been of the follow-my-leader variety. Only once in the course of several centuries has a writer been bold enough to make a convention for himself. Were it not that the material is ever fresh and the variations of human life and human love infinite, the novel would not have existed as long as it has done. It may be said, so far so its modern existence is concerned, to have been started with "Don Quixote," but it has been the custom of all the great practitioners of novel-writing to modify and adapt their model.

Thus "Gil Blas," though it was inspired by the masterpiece of Cervantes, became informed with a humour and a philosophy entirely French. Le Sage, though not too proud to learn from the master of his art, did not try to become a paragon, but maintained the purity of his own bright and smiling genius. His irony differs not in degree but in kind from that of Cervantes. Again, Fielding, after studying the same model, produced a "Tom Jones" with sufficient likeness to make it part of the school then recently started, and yet, too, retaining its author's own powerful individuality. It was in literature as in architecture. The mere bookman says that we borrowed this and the other thing from Italy, from France, and from Germany; but what we took we so modified that our houses and public buildings became absolutely English, and so it was with our novels. Sir Walter Scott had carefully read Fielding and was undoubtedly his follower and disciple; but, again, having loved and assimilated the romance of the Border and of Scotland, he put these special belongings into his work so that the Waverley novel became something quite distinct from that of Henry Fielding. As much can be said of Thackeray, George Eliot, and Charles Dickens. Each of these added a personal note.

A very similar history ran in another channel from Fielding. His contemporary, Richardson, started on a line of his own and inspired followers of a very different character. It was not only that his system of writing novels by letters was opposed to the ordinary narrative style, but his minute analysis of the feminine mind and his exaggeration of certain of its characteristics appealed more to Frenchmen than to Englishmen, and accordingly we have a long stream of French literature that has Richardson as its source.

But a characteristic of the period of literary decay is that what was previously intelligent study of the master is replaced by servile imitation. During the last ten or fifteen years we have had some thousands of cloak-and-dagger stories, each bearing the closest family resemblance to the others. We have had George Eliot imitated and repeated in a minor key. Dickens has been copied; and if the servile followers of Thackeray are fewer, that is simply because of the difficulty in making even a colourable imitation of his style. But it would be the greatest mistake in the world to imagine that anything like finality has been seen. The young novelist may take heart of grace and remember that human life may be pictured more poignantly and more vigorously than it ever has been before, when the writer arrives with intelligence enough to understand the technique of his craft as it was practised by the greatest English masters of it, and with the originality to work out his plan on entirely new lines. Before, dramatic effect was gained by the clash of physical strength with physical strength. Now, as we are becoming more and more intellectual, the novel must be a wrestling of spirit with spirit. And in regard to romance mere sword-play can now be put aside, probably for ever. Yet the necromancy of the present day is more astonishing than that of any past age. People are always prone to praise what has been done and they forget the wonder and the enchantment in the midst of which they live. Whoever can seize these difficult elements and present them as they should be presented may not, perhaps, sell his book by hundreds of thousands, but he will lay the foundation of a fame which no one else seems for the moment capable of achieving.

The sale of Shiplake vicarage will recall Tennyson's marriage, which took place fifty-five years ago next Tuesday. The vicar of Shiplake at that time was the Rev. Robert Drummond Burrell Rawsley, a Lincolnshire man, and a cousin of the bride, who was married from the vicarage. Tennyson had been a frequent visitor there, and though the building has received several additions, his room may still be seen. It was at Shiplake that he wrote the well-known stanzas of "In Memoriam" beginning: "Sad Hesper o'er the buried sun," and here his signature, written in a bold firm hand, may be inspected in the marriage register.

Nor is Tennyson the only writer whose name is connected with the vicarage. Here, in days of old, Samuel Johnson and Horace Walpole enjoyed the hospitality of James Granger, the eccentric vicar and a well-known print collector, whose name has entered the English language. In 1769 he published a biographical history of England, with blank leaves for the reception of portraits or other pictorial illustrations of the text; whence arose the pernicious vice of Grangerising, which has resulted in the mutilation of many a fine volume. Granger stated in the preface to his history that his ambition was to be an honest man, and no doubt he would be extremely shocked if he could be informed of some of the results of his innovation.

We alluded last week to the fact that John Harvard's mother was a native of Stratford-on-Avon. Americans will be interested to hear that her house there is to be sold next month. It is a black and white timbered structure of three storeys, adorned with a gable, and is one of the oldest and perhaps the best remaining example of domestic architecture in the town. In this house Katherine Rogers lived from 1596 until her marriage with Robert Harvard, and to it she may have come with her little son John to attend the funeral of her father. Her wedding took place from the house in 1605. Considering the overshadowing fame of Shakespeare it is not remarkable that this house has attracted so little attention, and allusions to it in any English books except guide-books are by no means easy to find. Perhaps some American will buy it for transportation to Boston.

Is American literature in any way influencing English literature? Sir Gilbert Parker answers the question in the negative in the Book Monthly—rightly, beyond a doubt, if his remarks are to be understood as applying only to the productions of the current hour. In the past, American literature has, in one or two cases, and in one or two directions, exerted influence. Fenimore Cooper was one of the anticipators of the romanticism of the thirties, and so influenced other writers besides Gustave Aimard. Emerson affected English thought by giving the transcendentalism of Kant a meaning which may not have been Kant's, but was at any rate intelligible to the plain man.

Edgar Allan Poe gave the hint to Stevenson, who in his turn foreshadowed Sherlock Holmes—a brave pedigree for such a horse!—and some have supposed that Mr. W. S. Gilbert owes something of his metrical mastery to a study of Poe; not Poe the theorist with his mathematical schemes, but Poe the poet. Sir Gilbert Parker himself, we should say, owes something to Bret Harte; and the influence of Mr. Howells and Mr. Henry James on our English fiction is too obvious to need the mention of instances. Whitman, that lonely star, has not exercised an influence so much as provided a mark for imitation; but there is one instance, at least, of an English poet who drew from him inspiration for original work. We refer to Henley, whose hospital poems in "A Book of Verses" and other of his works are clearly (and, we believe, confessedly) influenced by Whitman. Another American poet to whom Henley was indebted was Longfellow. The manner of:

"In the street of Bye-and-bye Stands the hostelry of Never,"

is Longfellow's all over.

The influence of Oliver Wendell Holmes, too, can be traced, not so much in our books as in our journals, and he may be found on every page of those. As to Hawthorne, he is baffling. His genesis is clear enough; but just as he was the child, not of the literature, but of the daily life of his time and country, so he appears to have no literary succession.

An article in Temple Bar, entitled "The Philosophy of Aubrey de Vere," though it fails to present a definite philosophy at all, recalls an interesting but almost forgotten figure. To all save those who remember the eccentric, clad in a jacket of velvet, who paid occasional visits to the Athenæum, De Vere is but a name. It has been his fate to be outshone by the light which Wordsworth shed upon his age. Born at Curragh Chase, living his life there in a peace "man did not make and cannot mar," isolation gave De Vere an outlook on life so detached and so lofty that it induced his friends to declare that only his feet touched earth. Religion certainly occupied the poet's mind, but Mr. Michael Barrington is scarcely correct in maintaining that "the poetry and philosophy of Christianity were the most absorbing subject of De Vere's imaginative meditation." Christianity was wholly alien from his thought when he wrote that part of "The Foray of Queen Meave" which recounts the prowess of Cuchullain of Muirthemne; there is no trace of it in his other poems of Irish lore; and it played a secondary part in his sonnets and short pieces. Poetry, we take it, reflects the poet's meditation.

A youthful friend of Wordsworth, the intimate, in later years, of Tennyson, De Vere possessed a sincere reverence for contemporary, as for all other poetry, but he seldom imitated, and "Alexander: a dramatic poem" was a failure. He was to be unconventional in his choice of themes, and he would succeed despite his unconventionality. "The first of themes sung last of all" was not to be his; so he turned to the legends of his own country. And it is when we read of these legends that he is really arresting. All the mysterious which led him to the Church of Rome is concentrated in his presentment of the instincts: the lust of battle, as in "The Foray of Queen Meave," the fierceness of race antipathies, as in "Ethell," the hunger for revenge, the instinctive hate, and the instinctive hatred of warrior for warrior. Simplicity was the keynote of De Vere's verse, and the simplicity he gains his effects, as in "Oiseen and Samthea," where the warrior and the bard are at difference, his pretty fancy, "Smiles are the wrinkles of our

It has been urged against Aubrey de Vere that he was an idealist; but he was never wholly that. His high opinion of individual and collective humanity, yet he was always keenly alive to the possibilities of illusionment. Friendship—to him trust of all ties—filled all that was lacking in his life; and Barrington is happy in his comparison between De Vere's friendships with Miss Fenwick and Sara Coleridge, daughter of S. T. C., and that of John Evelyn the naturalist and Margaret Godolphin. Though the poet dwelt on sorrow, in the clouds, he was the friend of all the world; sorrow touched him deeply. No man who had never known acute grief could have penned the sonnet on Somerville presented so graphic a picture of Ireland in 1844: De Vere. Opening with a vision of spring, he traces the passage of the seasons and the growth of the land with the advent of winter, we hear the voices of the stricken, hoarse from starvation, lie down and lose themselves in death. "To-morrow Aubrey De Vere will be here; will you not be pleased to see him?" once Sir William Rowan Hamilton of his son, a child to a man in thought. "Thinking of Latin, and thinking of trouble, and thinking of God, I had quite forgotten Aubrey de Vere," answered the boy. And so the poet, preoccupied, has forgotten.

Spring cleaning is probably over by now in most libraries, but the following "tip" for cleaning books without spilling dirt over them again as fast as they are cleaned may be of interest to our readers. We take it from the fourth Annual Report of the Grand Rapids Public Library, Michigan, U.S.A. The library has lately been moved to a new building, and the method of cleaning was as follows:

"Several men and women were hired to do the heavy work. The men took the books from the shelves and placed them upon trucks, being careful to keep them in their proper order. When a truck was full it was wheeled to a point near an open window where a tub of water was standing. Half a dozen galvanised tubs had been rented for the purpose, and were kept full of fresh water. The men would take two books from the truck and first clap them together, knocking dust and dirt from the surface into the water. Then the book was taken separately, opened over the tub, and the leaves were held by holding the back up, with one cover horizontal, and allowed the leaves to fall rapidly, thus emptying the book of any loose objects it might contain. It was a marvel to the workers to see how the dirt absorbed the dirt. The variety of objects that fell from the books was surprising, and included combs, hair-pins, matches, tooth-picks, string, scraps of cloth and paper, hair ribbons, shoe-strings, leashes, and many other objects too numerous to mention; in fact, everything almost that would be placed in a book—except money. Meanwhile one of the women had thoroughly cleaned the shelves, and when the truck was wheeled back, another removed the books and, carefully wiping them with a cloth, placed them back on the shelves as before."

The difficulties which arose over the interpretation of a clause in Mr. G. F. Watts' will providing for the distribution of certain of the artist's pictures amongst the public galleries, were happily settled on Monday by the approval of a scheme suggested by a committee of selection. Over a hundred works are to be placed in the Limerick Art Gallery, for which Mrs. Watts has promised to provide a maintenance fund, and sixteen portraits, including that of the artist himself, are to be retained there until they can be presented to the National Portrait Gallery. Alice is to go to the National Gallery of Art of New South Wales; Mischief to the National Gallery, Princes Street, Edinburgh; Faith, Hope, and Charity to the National Gallery, Dublin; Echo to the Nottingham Art Gallery; The Record Angel, The Court of Death, and The People that Sat in kness, to the Manchester Art Gallery; and A Study for Court of Death and Britomart to the Norwich Art lery. The study in gesso of "Physical Energy"—which had lately in the courtyard at Burlington House—is to be used for making a bronze statue for London, and will afterwards form part of the collection at Limnerslease.

LITERATURE

THE LAMB LETTERS

The Works of Charles and Mary Lamb. Edited by E. V. LUCAS. Vols. vi. and vii., Letters. (Methuen, 7s. 6d. each).

MR. LUCAS is to be congratulated at once upon his knowledge, energy and patience. No other man has done so much work as he towards introducing the public to Lamb, in a spirit at once individual and sympathetic. And here certainly is the largest, richest edition of the Letters which has been published, clearly superior to some in size, to others in the quality and scope of the notes, and to all as a book that is easy and pleasant to read.

The letters of Lamb contain probably the most complete revelation of a man, body, soul and clothes, that has yet been made by poet, novelist, letter-writer, diarist or autobiographer. It would be rash to compare them with the diary of Pepys, because we can live with Lamb, where (if we choose) we see Pepys only through a chink. This alone would explain their reputation. Their popularity, on the other hand, comes from a more or less conscious comparison of the letters with the pure, the terse, the old letters of Sir Henry Wotton, Cowper's, with all their grace and sweetness and pride and mystery, Byron's sense and power, Shelley's picturesqueness, the pungency and leisure and self-knowledge of FitzGerald; Lamb having their qualities more completely or having more or better neighbours for them. For no other man has reached just the combination of self-consciousness and self-surrender which, because it is perfect in Lamb, has come to seem the letter-writer's proper gift. In Lamb, once only, the charm of egoism is equalled by the power of unselfishness, so that it is hard to say whether he or the rest made the better half of his world. These things everybody knows. Lamb is fashionable. His whims, his style—which are good because they are entirely his—are in danger of being flattered, where admiration should rather choose a less easy path than imitation.

The greatest and most remarkable of the attractions of these letters is their consistency with Lamb's literary work. It is an almost unique consistency and certainly unique in its degree. In most other writers, the apparent discrepancy between their letters and their art has been so great that a man may be excused for leaving the one or the other alone. Suppose an average man to have the poetry and the letters of Keats, for example. The self-revelation in the letters to Miss Brawne is great; it is great in "Hyperion"; but the task, which is not lightly avoided, of relating the two modes of revelation, is likely to alarm any one of moderate leisure and powers; the letters, on the one hand, are so diffuse, so disabled by the lack of accent—of handwriting and a thousand little methods of expression which a letter-writer may trust in—that, however they may excite our curiosity or pity or horror or contempt, few will undertake to prove that they were written by the author of "The Ode on a Grecian Urn." If one could read Coleridge's or Shelley's letters before reading his poetry, would one's guesses at the poetry on the strength of the letters be worth anything? or could one guess at Wotton's verses from his letters to Walton and Dinely? But nobody would be accused of over-confidence if he should say that after reading twenty pages of Lamb's letters he could only be faintly surprised and continually delighted by the essays. Thus the letters and essays, tales and verses of Lamb altogether make a more complete picture of an artist, a human being, than is likely to be made again by the maker of riddles; and one is reminded inevitably of:

"I hate a lukewarm artist. I have known actors—and some of them of Elliston's own stamp—who shall have agreeably been amusing you in the part of a rake or a coxcomb, through the two or three hours of their dramatic existence; but no sooner does the curtain fall, with its leaden clatter, but a spirit of lead seems to seize on all their faculties.

We have received from the publishers, Messrs. King, and Olding, an interesting addendum to Mr. Heath's book, "Our Stellar Universe," reviewed in our columns on April 29. It consists of six stereograms of the sun and stars, prepared by Mr. Heath so as to give the eyes some conception of the starry heavens as space of three dimensions. The success of Mr. Heath's ingenious plan is really remarkable, and adds to our already expressed regret that human eyes can never directly see the majestic perspective of the skies. We may note that Mr. Heath's work in this regard excited much interest at the recent conversazione of the Royal Society.

Admirers of Lamennais are probably aware that his published correspondence is incomplete, some four hundred letters that he wrote to Madame Yemeniz not being included in it. Madame Yemeniz was the wife of a wealthy silk merchant at Lyon, and an intimate friend of the lonely scholar. At one period, fearing that the Jesuits would interfere with his letters to her, he asked her to send them back to him, but she refused. Thereupon Lamennais, furious at the refusal, dissociated himself from everything contained in the correspondence. About one-tenth of it is now in course of publication in the Revue de Paris, the first letter being dated 1826, when Lamennais was at the height of his fame. The correspondence, which seems to have been interrupted at the time of the rupture with Rome, was resumed in 1836 and continued until 1851. It contains some interesting details about Lamennais' imprisonment at Sainte-Pélagie.

We mentioned, the other day, that John Stuart Mill's house at Avignon was for sale. His library, including some manuscripts and notes, has been acquired by Madame Roumanille, the widow of the founder of the Félibrige. The hope is expressed by a French contemporary that some of the philosopher's posthumous fragments may now be published. These are said to include an unfinished essay on Auguste Comte, and a long study entitled "On social freedom."

Our notes on the visitors' book at Les Charmettes remind a correspondent of an entry which he once saw made in the visitors' book at Voltaire's house at Ferney:

"I drove there," he writes, "with a Cook's party in a waggnette. One of my companions was a German who asked the most intelligent questions, and displayed the keenest enthusiasm. We all expected, when the visitors' book was brought out, that he would be sure to write something rhapsodical in it. Not at all. He just stamped the page with a rubber stamp. Following him, I had the curiosity to read what he had printed there. The entry ran: DR. SCHMIDT: Frankfurt-am-Oder: FRAUEN-ARTZ."

Evidently the passion for using visitors' books for purposes of réclame is not confined to Frenchmen.

The English edition of Mr. George Santayana's volume on "Reason in Common Sense" was published, as it happened, on or about the very day on which our review of the American edition appeared in last week's number of the ACADEMY. With it comes a second volume, that on "Reason in Society." The publishers are Messrs. Archibald Constable and Co., and the price of each volume is 5s. net.

Mrs. Stewart Erskine, who wrote the very successful volume on "Lady Diana Beauclerk" some two years ago, has in preparation a book entitled "Beautiful Women in History and Art." In it an attempt will be made to present a connected history of the lives of some of the most beautiful and distinguished women of the past, accompanied by authentic portraits in photogravure. The work will be published in the early autumn by Messrs. Bell.

"I owe more than to any other book." Mr. Sharp has made himself thoroughly acquainted with 5 editions of the play and with "much good work in our classical periodicals." We would say that he is too much biased in favour of the manuscript reading when it cannot be right. For instance, we read in 6 that the beetle was the only winged creature that 7 its way to the gods, and Aesop is quoted as the 8 ty for the statement. But the scholiast tells us 9 e Aesopian fable related how the beetle had accom- 10 the feat to avenge himself on the eagle, who had 11 his grubs and taken refuge with Zeus. Therefore 12 le must have been with the gods before the beetle; 13 re the beetle was not "the only one of winged 14 μόνος πετεινῶν, to reach the gods. Mr. Sharp- 15 leach criticism unsympathetic. But the Greek 16 do not say silly things and ask for our sym-Aristophanes never wrote μόνος πετεινῶν, what- 17 he wrote. Again, can τρία καὶ δέκ' ἔτη be 18 in 990. The evidence excellently marshalled by 19 arpley in his able Introduction shows that the 20 must have been produced in 421, the tenth year of 21 Ioponnesian War. Can some such word as τρικακοί 22 orriest case" underlie τρία καὶ? The adjective is 23 und elsewhere, but is quite justified by analogy, and 24 ity would account for its corruption. It is idle to 25 se that the poet antedates the war by three years, or 26 ρία καὶ means here merely "ever so long," a signi- 27 n which it does not necessarily bear even in the 28 ge from the Plutus quoted in defence of it. Another 29 ive, τριβακοί, "worn out," would meet the difficulty, 30 t is found only as applied to worn out clothes. 31 er's brilliant θείον for σείον, 960, is rejected for good 32 ns for Herwerden's σείσω τε. There seems to be 33 one servant in attendance on Trygaeus, and fumiga- 34 would come before the dipping of the torch in the 35 d water and the sprinkling of the altar.

t the place where the editor seems to us to deal worst 36 the text is in the famous passage 741-747, where he 37 most modern editors) transposes 742 and 743. Let 38 eaders consult the passage, which is too long to quote 39 ; let them read the verses in the order in which they 40 given in the manuscripts, and correct φεύγοντας το 41 ντας, "wailing, crying φεύ," and we have a quite 42 ligible passage in praise of the poet's originality of 43 od, which may be rendered roughly thus:

"He banish'd that 'Heracles making his cake'
—'Tis our gallant Poet's boast—
With his craving stomach, his Oh's and his Ah's
And his cozenings of mine Host,
Who is constantly getting a drubbing of course,
Just to make a bit of fun,
Our Poet, too, first cashier'd at once
Those stage-slaves every one
That, like Heracles, drown'd the stage with tears
For no possible reason, I wiss,
But to give their fellow slaves a cue.
For some time-honour'd joke like this:
'What punishment 's come to your hide, old chum?
On your wretched ribs, alack!
Has the whip-lash made in force a raid,
And disforested your back?'" acles "roars" in Frogs, 562. Aristophanes would not 44 ve used φεύγοντας ("exiled"), but ἀποδρύντας, for run- 45 ay slaves.

A very good note on 639 establishes that σείειν had in the 46 ot of Comedy the meaning "to blackmail"—a metaphor 47 om shaking fruit-trees according to Photius. If this be 48 we have a curiously parallel phrase in "shaking the 49 goda tree," by which our rude forefathers meant some- 50 ing not unlike blackmailing the Nabobs. Why does not 51 e editor put in his text Van Leeuwen's "brilliant 52 nendation," as he rightly calls it, ἐν Ἀἰδέω for ἀναίδεω 53 8), which removes a great difficulty as well as the only 54 lerable argument for an ancient revision of the play? 55 nd why does he say that the emendation "involves a 56 roceusmatic in the second foot"? Surely τὴν should be 57 ruck out as the interpolation metri gratia of some one who did not know the niceties of the Ionic dialect, thought 58 the Ἀἰδέω was dissyllabic, and wrote αἰνίττεται in the verse 59 before.

The editor rightly gives καταιβάτου for καταιβάτου in 42, 60 but we do not like Koch's ἐπέμπομεν for ἐπαίσαμεν, 874. 61 Such a conjecture would have ruined the career of 62 Thackeray's Archdeacon, who owed his promotion to the 63 fact that "he introduced into a play of Aristophanes three 64 new indecent puns by conjectural emendation." The 65 dual form τὼ σέλει is given in two passages in obedience 66 to the uniform practice of inscriptions. Take notice, ye 67 who are about to present yourselves for public examina- 68 tions.

Mr. Sharpley is often very happy in his renderings, but 69 he has missed some chances, e.g., "thoroughbred highflier," 70 76, "what a stinger!" 257, "kick all our things to bits," 71 319, "General Mat," 347, "pulverised," 380, "such as 72 work in wood" (Rogers) 479, "meddler and muddler," 73 654, "made this man his figleaf at a pinch," 687, "holding 74 a reception day" (with pun on holding out the hand for a 75 bribe, Rogers), 909, "hands off the haunch" (Rogers), 1053; 76 but the editor's "plume-onia" is better than Roger's 77 "crest-ache" in 1211. The lines 246, 247 are mock-heroic, 78 and may be rendered as a parody of a tragic passage:

"O Megara, Megara, how thou shalt be crushed Ground and resolved eftsoons into a stew!"

We are surprised that the editor did not give in 1098 the 79 now accepted reading of the Homeric passage:

ὅς πολέμου ἔραται ἐκιδημίος κρυέντος.

The word κρυέειν could have no meaning as applied to war. 80 The edition is an excellent one of a play which is immor- 81 talised by the matchless idyll 1127-1171.

MR. ROBERT BRIDGES' MASK

Demeter: A Mask. By ROBERT BRIDGES. (Oxford: Clarendon 82 Press, 1s. net.)

THE first excellence of Mr. Bridges' mask of "Demeter and 83 Persephone," and the most to be remembered, lies in the 84 peculiarities of his version of the myth. For he takes away 85 nothing from its simplicity and beauty as every one knows 86 it, while the cunning of his invention and the dignity of 87 the result seem to us to make his the version which, more 88 than any other, can be enjoyed to-day. He may, indeed, 89 be said to succeed, not entirely, but still nobly, not only 90 in expressing the myth in such a way as to tell us what 91 it probably meant to a Greek, but in adding to it—as 92 martins' nests add to some rich architrave—a suggestion 93 of the thoughts and emotions which have grown up around 94 it in time. If one could suppose that the old gods, in 95 Hades now, were to summon up their past sorrows by re- 96 enacting the rape of Persephone, thus perhaps it would be 97 played, or, if not, it could be no less worthily played. 98 For not in vain have Christ and St. Francis died since Per- 99 sephone was lost.

In the beginning, Hades prologises, announcing that 100 Zeus has granted his wish to take Persephone as his queen 101 in Hades:

"the Daughter
Of gentle-eyed Demeter; and her passion
Is for the flowers, and every tenderness
That I have long'd for in my fierce abodes."

The Oceanides, Persephone's companions, enter the fields 102 of Enna, singing. Persephone and Athena and Artemis 103 follow, and the girl, her basket filled with flowers, compares 104 "the joy of earth" with "the balanc'd calm of high 105 Olympian state." The other goddesses reveal to her that 106 there is an element in her emotion which is not in theirs, 107 and is in man's: "'Tis pity, child, . . . thy mighty mother 108 leans to this tenderness"; and they explain the sadness of 109 man:

"Alike, 'tis sad
To read how beauty dies and he must die."

Persephone is impatient of their wisdom, which depends upon immortality; she is drawn to man, and chooses what man shall hold consecrate to her:

"In the forest, but only among the flowers Thou shalt dwell, and love for beauty, when to live . . ."

Studying the flowers, and choosing one which shall be her emblem, the strays alone, and Hades carries her off.

In the second act Demeter laments her loss and tells the nymphs of her seeking Persephone through the world in vain. She vows to destroy the world, Zeus and men, if he does not restore her daughter; she will cause the useless flowers to take the place of fruit and grain; and, though Hermes reminds her that her daughter is now "raised to a place on the tripartite throne," she gives him a message of cursing and defiance to Zeus.

In the third act, the nymphs try to persuade Demeter to relent, reminding her that her anger will be fatal to man. She relates the story of her wanderings . . . of her attempt, at Eleusis, to make sorrow a friend to man; but while she speaks, Hermes leads in Persephone, who has learned in Hades the wisdom Demeter has learned from men, of life and death. Persephone goes off with her mother to the spring festival at Eleusis.

The progress of the mask is admirable, stately, and here and there agreeably troubled by such moments as that in which Demeter hears, but the chorus does not hear, the sound of Persephone's returning steps; when the nymphs interrupt Demeter and ask whether she could not have saved Demophoon; or when Demeter surprises the nymphs by showing them Dædalus' picture of Persephone, crowned and not smiling. If there is anything to be blamed, it is that the purely learned knowledge of Persephone and the modern emotional estimate of her seem to have been mingled in Mr. Bridges' mind rather by a powerful intellectual effort than by a perfect ecstatic perception of their consistency. There are passages in which the two are blended well, as in Persephone's soliloquy among the flowers; but there are passages at the end of the third act which seem to us to be too heavily burdened with reason.

The verse throughout is extraordinarily interesting, and there is much that is worthy to rank with the best of modern verse, both in its novelty and in its excellence. The blank verse, e.g., is as current and simple as Fletcher's, while a careful reader sees that it is as self-conscious as Tennyson's and far more varied. It is spoiled only by a use of accents which shows how little Mr. Bridges is aware of the extent to which readers have profited by the precepts and examples of the poets of to-day. He will not trust us with his sense; and we could point to places where his accents really tend to spoil the rhythm which a careful reader would give to his lines. The lyrics contain many experiments, but, clever as they are, and interesting and often enjoyable, we think that their imperfection is clearly shown by the fact that all his best things are to be found elsewhere; they have troubled him so much that he has been unable to get into them his characteristic thought and observation; and their style is not only always inferior to, but sometimes different from, the style of the verse which is proper to his mind.

With the mask comes Mr. W. H. Hadow's music thereto, which is full of melody and dignity, the work of one who is at once scholar and musician.

A PECULIAR PEOPLE

A Peculiar People, the Doukhobors. By AYLMER MAUDE. (Constable, 6s. net.)

THE Russian peasant sect, known as the Doukhobors, have found an honestly painstaking advocate in Mr. Aylmer Maude, who is strongly in sympathy with these persecuted fanatics. They have defied Russian conscription; and by the help of such potent friends as Count Tolstoy, have been removed to Canada, forming there an industrial settlement of some 7500 men, women, and children. The experiment must have sorely taxed the patience of the Canadian authorities. For the sect holds a doctrine, the rejection of all external authority, the Bible, and yields blind obedience to their leader, at present a man named Peter Verigin, of their own documents thus describes:

"Great is the Lord above all the names in his power, and he is the Lord of the world. And his power is in the heart of the people of the Most-Holy Virgin Mary, the Mother of Heaven, of the blessed race of Doukhobors. I am your leader, Peter Verigin, the Virgin's Son. I am your God and Father, and with all these powers."

A mass of ignorant peasants, apparently across a hundred years of isolated existence to be told ideas on what they called the "voice within," the commands of a leader whom they deified, and as Mr. Maude fully acknowledges, by a phylloxera characteristic, presents a curious spectacle viewed among the sane and orderly British Canadian author draws the obvious comparison here Doukhobors and the Anabaptists of the sixteenth-century Westphalia, though we do not expect to hear that Verigin, like John Leyden, has introduced polygamy and taken four wives. His natural shrewdness must have stood both himself and his ignorant flock in good stead. Still, when, in 1896, we find him suggest "we should give up the use of all things made by man, we need not wonder at the Nudity Pilgrimage and excesses witnessed in Canada. The first of these pilgrimages involved a march of some 1500 men, women, and children, having little with them, with the alleged intention of meeting Christ, preaching the Gospel, and reaching a country where there would be no government and they would eat fruit from the trees. The pilgrims handed over their money to the nearest innkeeper; let their horses and cattle run free (they were promptly rounded up by the mounted police); drove the sheep to a distance, handing them over to the care of wolves (wolves came and devoured them) and cut the men's hands and eyes from their clothing. This "pilgrimage" was finally stopped by Government, and the pilgrims returned by train to their villages, not before some of them had gone quite crazy. The following year a second "pilgrimage" was started, with the additional feature that now and then, especially when entering any town or village, the "pilgrims" divested themselves of all garments. Mr. Maude quotes a letter written by one of these "pilgrims" telling us how he and other Doukhobors "went and preached how one should live rightly . . . in the manner of the first man, Adam, and of Eve, to show the world the way to humanity. . . ."

After the suppression of this second pilgrimage the sect most elect—we quote again from the letter—

"trampled down with a roller the growing corn. . . . That men should not put their trust in human science, but in God. And we also burnt a binding machine. Why? Our brethren should not torment animals, but should trust in God. I am kept as if under arrest. . . . It is so sad that I cannot tell you it. I sit without work; my work humanity does not wish to do yet it is not my work but God's."

It is but just to add that the majority of the Doukhobors refused to follow the "pilgrims," a division which has since split in twain. The party animosities of these professors of peace are not the least curious outcome of their mental and mental confusion; thus, in the strife over the question of adopting communism (the communal form of property holding is now general among the Doukhobors) those who for conscience' sake withstood the bearing of arms in their country, fought among themselves with pitchforks and staves. At present, Verigin's gift for practical business appears to be exercised for the good of his people, and instead of his organising material prosperity for them by purchasing excellent horses and cattle for breeding purposes, as well as the latest kinds of agricultural machinery, he seems to be already bringing some sobriety of mind to the sect.

LITERARY GEOGRAPHY

Is and Byways in Derbyshire. By J. B. FIRTH. With illustrations by NELLY ERICHSEN. (Macmillan, 6s.)

Good things the volumes of the "Highways and Byways" series are the more prized because they come. But as each appears we realise that the general of the series has a high standard, and is determined to maintain it. Books of such beauty and lasting value are brought into being as the result of a few week-cursions and an omnivorous browsing amongst a host of guides. Mr. Firth's "Derbyshire" is to the full as high and as companionable as any of its predecessors, for some of us, there are omissions to regret, he disarms admitting at the outset that his route was arbitrary and did not cover the entire county. Of what he has given there will be few to wish anything away, even the pages led to places so universally known as Haddon Hall and Chatsworth. It is difficult to imagine a topographical the chief charm of which is not association. To an few the word-painter appeals with a force that no user of anecdotes can command, but most are content with their descriptions of scenery from the hand of the great draughtsman, and, if they want word-painting, go to the poets. Mr. Firth's principal virtue as guide is, then, should be, that he has brought together a rich store of information about the notable people with which the roads through which he passes are associated. The first and foremost in interest is the delightful material collected with Dr. Johnson and his visits to his old friend, Taylor, at Ashbourne. Taylor was an unblushing realist and spent most of his time enlarging and beautifying his Ashbourne residence and garden—even diverting the course of the river in his enthusiasm—whilst curates did duty for him at St. Margaret's, Westminster, and Market Broom. Johnson is supposed to have been under the impression that he was to be Taylor's heir, although he told Boswell that he is aware that Taylor realised his disapproval of his habits, which he calls "by no means sufficiently clerical," and says: "no man likes to live under the eye of perpetual disapprobation." But it was Taylor who survived; in fact he preached the Doctor's funeral sermon. Speaking of the diverting of rivers, Derbyshire seems to yield an unusual number of instances of such masterful dealings with natural features, for at Ashford the river has been artificially broadened to form a lagoon, thus proving the prospect from Ashford Hall, and at Chatsworth, as we learn from a letter written by Sir Godfrey Kneller, and quoted by Mr. Firth, the first Duke of Devonshire planned to turn the course of the Derwent so as to cure a cascade near the house, and actually did level a hill which interrupted his view.

After the Johnson associations perhaps the most thrilling chapter is that which gives an account of the outbreak of the plague at Eyam. The story is well known; how the disease arrived in the village in a bundle of clothes received from London; how the villagers were cut off from all intercourse with their neighbours in the district; the devotion of the clergyman of the parish, Mompesson, and his wife; the furious course of the dreadful disorder, even the terror that remained for generations lest the chance opening of a grave might result in a recrudescence of the plague. A story was long current that this actually happened in 1757, but Mr. Firth has assured himself that it was without foundation, although he says that the terror of the possibility even yet survives. One of the strange side features of the narrative is the utter extinction of a family named Talbot who had kept a smithy on the road-side. The proud name of the Talbots and a road-side smithy! It is a real-life parallel of the D'Urberville-Durbeyfield tragedy. One statement of Mr. Firth's is puzzling. He says that William Mompesson declined the Deanery of Lincoln in favour of Dr. Fuller of "Worthies of England" fame, and on his first page he refers to Fuller as Bishop. Fuller was after the Restoration created Doctor of Divinity, and presented to the Rectory of Cranford, Middlesex, made Chaplain to the King and restored to his stall in the Cathedral of Sarum, but it does not appear that he was ever Dean of Lincoln or elevated to the Episcopate.

The praises that Derbyshire called forth from such men as Gilpin, Wordsworth, Byron, Ruskin, and Hawthorne are all recorded, and Mr. Firth points out that the wanderer by the Dove must feel an added delight in it when he recalls that it was the beauty born of the murmuring sound of the Dove that passed into the face of Lucy. Of verse concerned with Derbyshire indeed, Mr. Firth's collection is a positive anthology, though perhaps some of the flowers may be a little prim. He has even so recent a poem as Mr. Watson's magnificent sonnet "Night on Curbar Edge." But one gem he has missed, the "Angling Days" of Mr. Coutts, not the least musical of all celebrants of the Derwent, Dove and Wye. One would have liked to see a stanza of this in Mr. Firth's posy, or even only the four lines

"Then, as across the dewy mead
I hurried to the stream,
The lark on his delirious reed
Piped to the morning beam."

Of the unexpected in a topographical book is the identification of places in famous novels with real places on the route. This Mr. Firth has done for us with regard to "Adam Bede," "Jane Eyre," "David Grieve," and "Pride and Prejudice," though a little compunction may be pardoned on our being asked to believe that Chatsworth is the Pemberley of the irresistible Mr. D'Arcy.

One thing may be cordially hoped by all readers of this volume, that Mr. Firth's indignation at desecrations by the trippers may lead to some amendment in this respect.

In Miss Erichsen's illustrations, which so adequately supplement Mr. Firth's text, the influence of more than one of the black and white artists of the day is to be detected, but she has evidently adopted their conventions quite frankly and with admiration.

DR. JEVONS' POSTHUMOUS ESSAYS

The Principles of Economics—a Fragment of a Treatise on the Industrial Mechanism of Society—and other Papers. By the late W. STANLEY JEVONS. With a Preface by HENRY HIGGS. (Macmillan, 10s. net.)

It is nearly a quarter of a century since the study of economics sustained an almost immeasurable loss by the death of Professor Jevons at the early age of 45, and presumably the fragment of the treatise now published represents all that was written of a work which he was known to have had in contemplation at the time of his death.

Every one will agree with Mr. Higgs that "among the economists of all time Jevons unquestionably stands in the first rank." Not only was his work characterised by knowledge at once comprehensive and microscopic and by a critical faculty of the highest kind, but he wrote with perfect clearness and a charm of style unattained by any other modern writer upon Political Economy. The fragment is a mere outline, but it comes from a master hand and is doubly welcome at a time when the need for restatement of definitions is particularly evident. Every participant in the present fiscal struggle, for instance, on whichever side he may have ranged himself, will derive unmixed benefit from even a hasty perusal of this volume—fragmentary though its chief constituent may be.

Agreement between disputants as to the precise signification of the terms which they employ has ever been insisted on, not only as a means of peace in half the battles that are waged, but as a necessary condition of all social progress. The chief task of economic writers has been to assist the possibility of such agreement, and the science has been happy in having attracted many men of high literary talent. Adam Smith, Mill, Cairnes and Jevons always display the knowledge, the scientific precision and the power of analysis that we demand; but each of them possessed the gift of facile and graceful expression; and with them we contrast impatiently such elegant literary trifling as, for example, Hume's Essay on the Balance of Trade.

Now and again in the volume before us we were reminded, momentarily, of Mr. Joseph Finsbury and his tables of comparative affluence enjoyed by the owner of a single income in Bagdad, Brighton, or Nijni-Novgorod. We need not regret that Jevons failed to complete his analysis of the London Directory, for, as he says, "infinite detail does not serve any of the purposes of science," and the best part of all his work is that larger wisdom which shines through almost every page, while the infinite pains and industry on which it rests are concealed from view.

Fragmentary, unrevised though it is, the treatise casts clear light upon the depths of each problem that it offers for our view; and all the old questions are stated with a freshness that we miss in the writings of more modern economists. What could be better than the following?

"Given the wants of a population how shall we best utilise existing wealth? given certain labourers with a definite environment how shall their labour be employed so as to produce the greatest quantity of commodities?"

Or again:

"Consumption is evidently the most important of the processes through which commodities pass, because things are only produced in order that they may be consumed usefully."

The critical power of Jevons is well sustained by his exposure of Mill's theory of capital, which was expounded, he tells us, "in four fundamental propositions, all false."

From a paper on "The Future of Political Economy," we may quote the following:

"I am aware that political economists have always been regarded as cold-blooded beings—little better, in fact, than vivisectionists. I believe that the general public would be happier in their minds for a little time if political economy could be shown up as an imposture like the greater part of what is called spiritualism."

In commenting upon the opposing schools of economists, Jevons quotes Mr. Laing's conclusion that "Every country has a political economy of its own suitable to its own physical circumstances and its own national character."

With this he seems to concur, for he had said at the outset:

"The enormous wealth of the United States has been created by the freedom and energy of internal trade acting upon natural resources of unexampled richness. It cannot for a moment be doubted that their wealth would be far greater still were external commerce in the States as free as internal commerce. To us, dwelling and working in this comparatively speaking very small island, endowed with no remarkable natural resources, except coal and iron—to us the freedom of external commerce is everything."

The editor has reprinted an article contributed by Jevons in 1881 to the Contemporary Review entitled "Richard Cantillon and the Nationality of Political Economy," which affords proof of his immense industry, for it contains practically the whole of the article now printed in the "Dictionary of National Biography."

The "Essai sur la nature du commerce en général," which has been attributed to Cantillon, was a wonderful piece of work; all the theories of the economists being contained "by anticipation in this moderate duodecimo volume." Here is to be found not only Quesnay's fundamental doctrine: "la terre est l'unique source de la richesse," but the germ of the essay of Malthus and "the hedonic speculations" of Professor Edgeworth. The "Essai" was published in 1755, and the personality of its reputed author is romantic and evasive indeed. Cantillon was a banker of London (one typographical error, deepening the mystery, says "Purden"); the associate of Law; beloved of a princess; a millionaire; and finally, in 1734, the victim of his cook, who afterwards burned the Jevons hints that the "Essai" may be the work of a French economist (the title-page is manifestly adopted the pretence of a French translation of the book to avoid police interference with his own). Such expedients were common enough; but it is not to believe in the authorship of this "master of science and finance," the friend of Newton, and the forerunner of Adam Smith.

Incidentally the claim of the bi-metallicists of Newton among their supporters is disposed of. Jevons tells us that Newton's motive when settling the guinea at 21s. was "not to fix in gold and silver the veritable proportions of their price," and the author to have been himself a steady monometallist:

"Il n'y a que le prix du marché qui puisse trouver la vraie valeur de l'or à l'argent, de même que toutes les propriétés des valeurs."

Every extract from the "Essai" stamps it as the highest value and it would be worth while, one thinks, for some modern economist to issue a new edition and to discuss, for example, Cantillon's fundamental position:

"La terre est la source ou la matière d'où l'on tire le travail de l'homme est la forme qui la produit et la richesse même n'est autre chose que la nourriture, les commodités et les moyens de la vie."

or the doctrine of "a par or relation" of the value of the value of labour, or his explanation of the fact that commodities and the cost of living are higher in the country. There are certainly more causes in producing this result than the circumstance that towns are always in debt to the country districts.

The volume is one that we cordially welcome, and bound to meet with the high appreciation of a discerning public. It is well printed, but the quality of the paper leaves much to be desired.

In Peace and War. Autobiographical Sketches. By Sir JOHN FURLEY, Kt. With Portrait. (Smith, Elder, 10s. 6d.)

SIR JOHN FURLEY has written an interesting, even important book, but it would, we suspect, have been more important and more interesting, if he had not been so afraid to "let himself go." In the very first sentence betrays his fear of being charged with what he calls vanity. It is really a great pity that in the presence of autobiography modesty should be so often displayed by those who really have something to say, people who have seen or done things of moment; while vanity, always senile, induces those who have led trivial and unimportant lives to record them in large books which no one reads.

There is probably no one now living who knows more about Red Cross and ambulance work than Sir John Furley. He took a leading part in the formation of the National Red Cross Society in 1868, and the outbreak of the Franco-German War found him to a certain extent prepared, for he had obtained invaluable experience during the gallant struggle which Denmark maintained in 1864 against the combined strength of Prussia and Austria. It is most interesting to read Sir John Furley's account of the great struggle between France and Germany, for it is written from a point of view which is certainly not common; that of one who is neither a soldier nor a civilian, but is simply bent upon alleviating, as much as is humanly possible, the inevitable horrors of warfare. It is well known that enormous sums were collected in England for the relief of the sick and wounded, and Sir John Furley devoted all his remarkable powers of organisation and administration to seeing that the money was spent to the best possible advantage. He started on the French side, but at Sedan he became absorbed in the German and soon we find him establishing a Red Cross at Versailles.

It was anything but a bed of roses. For instance, a city under the charge of Dr. Danford Thomas, afterwards a well-known London coroner, was seized at Vernon, where there was a great outcry, for the act was said to be a violation of the Geneva Convention. But Sir John Furley says the French were justified in at any rate trying to save Versailles, and the people of Vernon might fairly object to allowing food and wine, etc., to go through their hands unless the same privilege were accorded by the Germans to stores under the Red Cross destined for Paris.

"Food," he says significantly, "in the form of barrels of meat and tins, be sent to a hospital when there is a scarcity of provisions in the immediate neighbourhood it is not only the hospital which is benefited."

It was Sir John's duty to supplement the assistance and supplies furnished by the Army Medical Corps and Intelligence of the respective belligerents, and not to take up their places. He had therefore constantly to refuse applications for comforts, such as warm clothing:

"I comforted the soldiers; but prevention was the duty of the chiefs, and it was no part of my mission to add to the comfort of the combatants in the trenches."

When the French drove the Bavarian General, Von Tann, out of Orléans, Sir William Russell exclaimed: "What a go it will be, Furley, if we are hustled out of this city of these days!" Indeed, had this success been repeated, the result of the war might have been very different, and a good many would have been "hustled" out of Versailles. Says Sir John Furley:

"Any sacrifice would have been made rather than allow the King and Crown Prince to incur the slightest risk of capture. But speculations as to what might have been are useless. There was a want of discipline and an absence of everything which tends to make an army strong, on the side of Orléans; whilst in Paris those who could command and those who could fight were paralysed by political disputes, and by the black treachery of men whose want of patriotism is a disgrace to modern times."

The book gives a series of extraordinarily vivid pictures of life at Versailles at this time—tragedy and comedy inextricably mingled, death and disease in their most hideous shape, and a curious cosmopolitan society of war correspondents, nuns of various orders, diplomatists, travellers, even Mr. Home, the spiritualist!

"There was one volunteer who must not be forgotten. I allude to an intelligent and amiable bulldog that honoured the Dutch mess with its company. This popular and sagacious animal was called 'Bismarck,' for two reasons. In the first place he was of that particular shade of brown then known as 'couleur Bismarck,' and secondly he had a highly developed faculty for annexation. He afforded much amusement to the patients, and Bismarck was often to be found at the bedside of the wounded, whom he patronised irrespective of nationality. On one occasion some of us were passing through the gates of the château at night, and 'Bismarck' was called by one of the party. The name was quite sufficient and the sentry presented arms."

After the armistice Sir John Furley was refused admission to Paris. He therefore dressed up as a cocher in the livery of a diplomatist friend of his, and calmly drove his "master" into the city. Having thus established communication he constantly passed to and fro between Paris and Versailles, organising relief for the 30,000 sick and wounded soldiers in the capital. He saw the entry of the German Army into Paris, of which he says "the play was certainly not worth the candle," and he goes on to give a most impressive account of the Commune, of which he writes as follows:

"I believe that if the military authorities had looked a little beyond Versailles, and occupied themselves less with army reorganisation, and concentrated their endeavours on forming a small army for immediate use; and had M. Thiers allowed a rapid and severe blow to be struck at once, the army of the Commune never would have had a serious existence; Paris would have been spared many weeks of terror, and many beautiful monuments would yet be standing. . . . The army was, for a moment, paralysed by the indecision of the Government, the members of which had no right to charge it with their failings. Subsequent events proved that the troops required to be led and not consulted."

Unfortunately, considerations of space forbid us to do more than indicate the interest of these chapters. Sir John Furley took a leading part in the administration of the French Peasant-farmers' Seed Fund; he went about with Laurence Oliphant; and he visited the Communist seat of government. All through the worst horrors of the barricades, he was continually fulfilling his mission as a Red Cross knight; and here we may quote the conclusion to which his experiences throughout the war had led him:

"It was the Franco-German War which opened the flood-gates of international philanthropy on a scale and in a manner which will never again be permitted to neutrals. It has been proved from time immemorial that there has never been a great war in which the official means of relief for the sick and wounded have been found adequate. For this reason each of the great Powers has now a Central Red Cross committee in touch with its war department, supported by a network of district and local committees so organised in time of peace that it can without confusion take its place as a supplement to the military medical services at the same time as the military forces of the nation are mobilised."

Hardly less interesting is Sir John Furley's account of the Carlist War of 1874, into which he eagerly threw himself on his usual errand of mercy. He succeeded in rescuing with extraordinary difficulty O'Donovan, the special correspondent of the Daily News, from a Carlist prison, and he was a spectator of the three days' battle of Estella, the principal battle of the campaign, of which he gives a detailed description. Next year we find him helping the sufferers from the terrible inundation of the valley of the Garonne; and in 1877 he is in Montenegro as the Special Commissioner of the National Aid Society. His work in the Boer War, when he supervised the "Princess Christian" Hospital Train and the "Princess of Wales" Hospital Ship, and acted as Chief Commissioner of the Central British Red Cross Committee, will be fresh in every one's recollection.

In addition to all his ambulance work, Sir John Furley is an old and experienced Volunteer, and we may quote in conclusion the two following stories, drawn from his entertaining reminiscences of the early days of our "citizen Army." The occasion was a visit of British Volunteers to Brussels, when they were warmly welcomed by the King of the Belgians. The first story is of a horse, one of many noble animals provided by Sir John:

"On the day when the King held a review of the volunteers, I was surprised by a gallant colonel of railway engineers who said, 'Furley, where did you pick up my mount?' On asking what was the matter with it, he replied, 'It must have had a circus education, for the moment the King and Queen arrived—and I was trying to look my best—the band struck up and my brute backed across the road and sat down on the kerb, whilst I slid down over his tail.'"

And the second of a man:

"Encouraged by the sight of so many Belgian comrades with be-medalled breasts, some of our men were inclined to follow their example and consequently required to be closely inspected. One day I spotted a man on parade who astonished me by the number of his medals. He evidently felt flattered by my notice and I said to him, 'You seem to have seen considerable service. In what wars have you been engaged?' He replied, 'Bless you, I've never been in a war: my father and I were awarded these medals at agricultural shows for a special breed of pigs for which we are famous.'"

A NEW-FOUND DIALOGUE BY WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR

WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR published his first volume in 1795, his last in 1863. This represents a period of literary production that is equalled by no other writer of similar standing. During that period, too, he was a frequent contributor to many journals, so that a full bibliography of his writings would be a work not easy to compile. Mr. Stephen Wheeler gave a tentative bibliography in 1897 at the close of his "Letters and other Unpublished Writings of Walter Savage Landor," and has from time to time made additions in the form of lists of Landor's contributions to particular periodicals. One periodical to the poet contributed in his old age appears to have been overlooked—and is probably but one of several. This is the National Magazine, started in 1857 under the editorship of John Saunders and Westland Marston. In the second volume are to be found three contributions, each of them signed in full by Landor, only one of which has hitherto been republished. At page 165 are two short poems, "Destiny Uncertain," which the poet included in his "Dry Sticks, Fagoted" (1858), and the following piece which, but for the signature, might well have been mistaken for one of the "fragments" of Thomas Lovell Beddoes:

THE MOTHER

"Unnatural mother,
Who've hastened to smother
Whatever is fairest and fondest in child;
In Hell's bitter water
You've plunged your own daughter,
Nor have wept when she wept nor have smiled when she smiled.

When sorrows assail you
Who then will bewail you?
The true and the tender for ever is gone.
Unnatural mother!
Ah, never another
Will love you or mourn you as she would have done."

This little piece is interesting as Landor's, though its inherent value is slight indeed; more notable is the other find made in the pages of a forgotten magazine.

It was in 1823 that Landor's first "Imaginary Conversation"—between Porson and Southey—was published in the pages of the London Magazine, in Elia's London, which has taken its place as something of a classic in the ranks of such periodicals. Nearly forty years later he contributed a short series of "Imaginary Conversations" to the Athenæum. In the interval he had employed this form as the chief vehicle for the utterance of his thoughts on men and things, so that the total number of "Imaginary Conversations" given in the latest collected edition of his works amounts to one hundred and sixty-five. Mr. C. G. Crump, the editor of the fine edition referred to, explained that, thanks to arrangements with the holders of Landor copyright, his edition of the "Imaginary Conversations" was complete. He had overlooked the National Magazine of 1857.

At p. 115 of the volume referred to above we find "Imaginary Conversation. By Walter Savage Landor." In the long series of conversations included in the works of Landor, by far the shortest section is that consisting of dialogues between distinguished Romans, and it is to this section that the new one will have to be added in any future edition of the author's works. The speakers are Tacitus and Agricola, and their conversation is supposed to take place on the eve of the latter's departure for Britain. It opens thus:

"Tacitus. Your daughter, my own beloved Julia, would have accompanied me hither, O Agricola, had I not reminded her that the bravest hearts are the least capable of uttering the sorrowful word 'Farewell.'

"Agricola. Universal word! uttered in the same tone, although in other syllables, by every nation. Word of the lover, of the widow, of the widower, and sometimes of the commander in the very hour of victory. May it never be sighed by our Julia on either of the two she loves best!

"Tacitus. I unite with you in this wish, my friend and father; but rather so than by the survivor over her urn.

"Agricola. Away with idle thought, with forebodings, with reminiscences! I am standing on the verge of a wide and waste field and must prepare to subdue and cultivate it. Most generals have attendants and followers; I have none beside a few domestics. In passing through Gaul, I shall collect the troops requisite for the expedition. The ships will have arrived before me, with sufficient stores for victualling them during many months, until fresh supplies from the coast of Belgium shall have landed. Wherever there is a scanty supply, there is a weak, because a discontented, army. Therefore even the least provident commanders have insisted that the naval forces be entirely under their control, and the commissaries be approved and appointed by them. The necessity of plunder is thus avoided, which alienates from us those we must conciliate before we govern.

"Tacitus. Conciliation saves in great measure the expenditure of force. Every plunderer raises a hundred enemies; and what he seizes may in half an hour do a damage which half a century is inadequate to repair. Barbarians soon forget an act of kindness; an injury sinks deep into the breast through woad and wolfskin.

"Agricola. The act of kindness then must be repeated, and the injury avoided.

"Tacitus. This is true philosophy, which, to be consistent, must be founded on humanity.

"Agricola. Since it is urgent I should leave the city by sunrise, I am rejoiced that much of the evening is left to me, and that I may continue to hear the expression of those sentiments which first engaged me and my daughter to cherish you so affectionately. Continue the remarks you were making on the Britons.

"Tacitus. Forgive me, if in continuation I should appear less indulgent. The Celtic and Cimbric races, cognate in origin, and similar in character, are never to be trusted in peace, until you exhibit and demonstrate to them practically its manifest advantages. O Agricola, can any nation, should any nation, tolerate an invader? It may be for their ultimate good, certainly it is not for their immediate. The Britons seem to be more restless in a state of inactivity than in a state of war. Impatient of agriculture, ignorant and disdainful of commerce, at present they appear to be irreclaimable from perfidy and ferocity.

"Agricola. Have not all nations been once in the same condition? the polished Persian, the scientific Egyptian; the forefathers of Pericles, of Sophocles, of Homer; the founders of Athens, of Corinth, of Miletus! Happy am I who am destined to conquer where I can destroy no cities, depopulate no habitations of industry, sink no transports of commerce; but, on the contrary, to show that, if Mars was our progenitor, the wolf has left in us no infection."

Invited to discourse further of the Britons, Tacitus here turns aside to discuss the position of the Romans, to point out how they had degenerated after the death of the Gracchi and the Scipios:

"The great Julius himself, no model of morality, was the only true reformer; for the Catos had in their character nothing of gentleness, of generosity, or even of humanity; and Brutus was little better than a copybook for schoolboys, to throw aside when they had done with ciphering. We have seen better men in times no better."

To his last sentence Tacitus returns later in the dialogue when he says to his father-in-law:

"The best of men (you, O Agricola, are an example of it) have appeared in the worst of times; few indeed of them; else the times had not been the worst."

Returning to the question of the Britons, Agricola proceeds to explain something of his military method to be employed, in the course of which he uses words which should bring a tingling sensation to the ears of some modern folk who have had to do with commissariat matters. (The words were written by Landor, it is worth recalling, when the Crimean campaign was fresh in the minds of men.)

"Our strongholds would at all times be replete with the necessities of subsistence. Any defect of precaution on the part of my commissaries will be punished by death, under the scourge of those they would have famished. Aware of the evil, and negligent in removing it, great would be my guilt; to be unaware of it, in my station, would be no less. Instead of triumph, or ovation, or any other species of military honor, or civil dignity, the lictor should unbind the fasces and bring out the central axe for me."

How the Britons are to be brought under the civilising sway of Rome is discussed, the reasons being adduced for allowing freedom of worship to the conquered: "We Romans took every god we could seize upon in the captured cities; they did us great good." Religions, Tacitus proceeds to say "slip easily one into another where the priest does not lay his wand across the road." To this Agricola adds: "It appears to me that no commodity is more marketable than the sacerdotal. The priest relaxes his hold on the man to seize the purse." Then the question of language is discussed; and later Tacitus returns to the Britons' gods, saying: "Men in all countries are the creators of their gods, created in their own similitude," and he expresses fear that the legionaries may mock the gods which, devised by the Gauls, frown and gibber over the Britons. To this Agricola is made to reply sagely, and in a very modern spirit:

"Each party shall retain its own deities until they insensibly crumble down and drop away. The chief advantage of any temple or place of worship, whether in city or field, is to bring men together in unanimity and amity. They come either for petition or thanksgiving. Is there any one so insolent and audacious, of such stolidity and impiety, as to believe the gods are readier to hear him than to hear his neighbour, to believe that one tone of voice or one idiom of language is more agreeable to their ear than another? When children disagree and quarrel, the parent chastises them: is the god less prudent than the parent?"

Had Landor published an edition of his "Imaginary Conversations" after 1857, there can be little doubt that he would have included this characteristic piece, which has so far escaped the notice of his editors. I have only been able to indicate the scope of the conversation and to extract representative bits. The whole would occupy about six columns of this journal.

THE RONDEAU

I

THE Rondeau is—if you've forgot—
A trifling, minor thing; no plot
To win the world's admiring eye
As to the Epic's majesty,
Or wealth of Sonnet; written not

As when with frenzied haste and blot
The Poet pours his Ballad, hot
From lovesick brain—a jeu d'esprit
The Rondeau is:

And though one may not bate a jot
Of all the points the rules allot—
The thirteen lines, the catch-words three,
The double rhyme, the symmetry—
From this example judge not what
The Rondeau is!

II

'Tis out of vogue, the censors cry,
A fashion of a day gone by,
When high-bred dame and gallant beau
Dallied within the silken show,
The bonds of ancient chivalry;

Dobson, Lang, Henley, skilled to try
Old modes, have wrought it gracefully,
But with new men new methods, so
'Tis out of vogue:

My friend, so long as you or I Cherish a thing, it cannot die;
Flowers out of fashion long ago
Do still in careless gardens blow.
Pluck one and look—and tell me why
'Tis out of vogue!

RICHARD JEFFERIES IN LONDON

It might be imagined that any large city, and London most of all, would be abhorrent to such a mind as that of Jefferies, the sensitive lover of Wiltshire and Sussex downs—the prose-poet of Summer's pageant, the student of harvest and hay-field, of bird and beast and flower. Those who know Jefferies well are aware that this is an entire mistake. The mistake has its root partly in a popular misconception of this great writer. Critics and reviewers, who very imperfectly understood him, used to speak of him, with a touch of condescension, as merely a pastoral writer, a naturalist, a kind of Gilbert White. Jefferies was all this, but he was something more. He was a thinker, though not in the language of the schools; a philosopher, though he formulated no system. He may have begun with the externals of things—the life of the poacher and the gamekeeper and the labourer, the habits and habitats of birds and flowers; but he passed on to the root-questions of existence, the underlying spirit, the quest of creation's secret, the thirst for a fuller "soul-life." He was never satisfied; he died yearning. "In the hearts of most of us," he says, "there is always a desire for something beyond experience." To such a man, the country was of supreme suggestion and never-failing loveliness; but city life had also its mysteries and its beauties. The red roofs and dense buildings had their own suggestiveness; there were the magnetism and sympathy of crowds, the flaming sunsets, the stars of night. "The sky above London is as full of interest as above the hills," he says in one of his papers; and he, like the poet of Westmoreland lakes and mountains, had witnessed the strange magic of a London sunrise. "I once watched the sun rise on London Bridge, and never forgot it." Every true artist knows the wonderful effects to be noted at times in London squares and on London bridges, and the true poet knows it also. It is only the small man, the limited sympathy, that sees no beauty in cities. It is easy to quote Cowper's hackneyed line: "God made the country and man made the town"; but Jefferies saw deeper than this. He once wrote an essay on the "Plainest City in Europe;" it was not London of which he wrote, but Paris. To him the best thing in Paris was the Vénus Accroupie of the Louvre, which he describes in a paper that shows how wonderful an art-critic he might have become. In a volume entitled "The Life of the Fields" he dared to introduce chapters on the sunlight of London squares; Venice, not on the Adriatic, but by the river in the East End. He did not believe that to see things it was necessary to travel far. "Open your eyes, and see those things which are around us at this hour." The life of the fields itself, he tells us, is to be found in London, if we only have eyes to see it.

Among the hills and field-hollows of Wiltshire he had dreamed his dreams, and thirsted for a richer draught of the soul-life that alone could satisfy; and when he came to London "still I thought my old thoughts." To him the grimy river was always making for the sea, and his soul travelled onward with it, to a haven of fuller existence.

"For I thirst with all the thirst of the salt sea, and the sun-heated sands dry for the tide, with all the sea I thirst for beauty."

And London itself, sordid, noisy, jarring, had hints of this divine beauty that his soul could follow. At night the stars were there:

"I never forget them, not even in the restless Strand; they face one coming down the hill of the Haymarket; in Trafalgar Square, looking towards the high dark structure of the House at Westminster, the clear bright steel silver of the planet Jupiter shines unwearied, without sparkle or flicker."

London produces its own sky, he says, and he thought that this sky could best be studied from the great bridges, where there is some breadth of horizon.

"Sometimes upon Westminster Bridge at night the scene is very striking. Vast rugged columns of vapour rise up behind and over the towers of the House, hanging with threatening aspect; westward the sky is nearly clear, with some relic of the sunset glow; the river itself, black or illuminated with the electric light, imparting a silvery blue tint, crossed again with the red lamps of the steamers."

Of the thousands that cross this bridge daily, few indeed pause to think that beauty of the open air, natural loveliness, may be found there; few have time to pause at all, unless they be strangers lingering to take a view of the Parliament buildings and the Abbey. But a Jefferies comes that way, and amidst all the outward distraction and the inward worry, the drudgery and anxiety of poverty, he notes the glimpses of the divine, the deep prevalent mystery of something that lies just beyond the senses, something that the senses only guess—something that may be felt among the lush meadows, or on the breezy downs, or here by the dingy London riverside. Even the monotony of red Bermondsey roofs was suggestive to Jefferies:

"These red-tiled roofs have a distinctiveness, a character; they are something to think about. . . . Under this surface of roofs what a profundity of life there is!"

If this endless succession of roofs could be found not unpleasing, it is little wonder that, standing in Trafalgar Square, the man could see a world of beauty before him.

"At my back, within the gallery, there is many a canvas painted under Italian skies, in glowing Spain, in bright southern France. But yet, if any one impartial will stand here outside, under the portico, and forgetting that it is prosaic London, will look at the summer enclosed within the square, and acknowledge it for itself as it is, he must admit that the view—light and colour, tone and shade—is equal to the painted canvas, is full as it were to the brim of interest, suggestion, and delight. Trace out the colour and the brightness; gaze up into the sky, watch the swallows, note the sparkle of the fountain, observe the distant tower chiselled with the light and shade."

The charm, the colour, the endless variety, are there; only the seeing eye is needed. It is well to be reminded sometimes, by the words of a genius like Jefferies, that the elements of beauty are never far to seek; if we miss them in town, we are not likely to find them in the country. Jefferies could ponder on profoundest mysteries in front of the Royal Exchange; they were mysteries older and deeper than those of finance. But men have yet little learned to think, to possess their souls; country solitudes are unspeakably dull to them, and they have not learned to make a solitude of thought for themselves in the thickest traffic and noisiest clamour of the city. They may ape a love of beauty, but the culture of it has not proceeded far enough for them to find it in the red roofs, the dusky river-side, the formal squares, the narrow streets. Jefferies was not a Londoner in the sense in which Dr. Johnson and Charles Lamb were Londoners; his true home was the swelling downs, the bracing uplands, the village of thatched cottages. But he saw London with the eye of a poet, and his soul also was at home there. Let us learn to remember that he was something more than a mere catalogue of birds and flowers.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

THE POET OF THE ELEGY

WHEN Dr. Johnson wrote his famous criticism of "The Elegy" there was one important point which he overlooked, and the omission renders his censure nugatory. This is the wonderful manner in which Thomas Gray caught the atmosphere that was absolutely essential to his poem. You feel on reading the first four lines the entire sentiment of a winter evening in the country: the tolling curfew, the lowing herd winding slowly o'er the lea, the ploughman trudging homeward, and the gradual, closing darkness prepare the mind for all that follows. And never in the course of the poem does the author insert a phrase or even a syllable to destroy this fine illusion. In that sense the poem is one of the most perfect in the English tongue.

Some little time ago I was at Stoke Poges, and in spite of much that has been done to vulgarise the surroundings, it still was easily imaginable that the train of thought expressed in "The Elegy" should pass through the poet's mind as he sat in the shade of that yew-tree which still stands to remind us of him. There is an addition to the churchyard, which has taken the shape of an ordinary town cemetery, with grave-stones fresh from the sculptor's hands, and sentimental epitaphs, and glasses with flowers, and all that makes a modern burying-place so repugnant. But if you shut your eyes to this and pass on to the other side of the church, there is a little graveyard which must be now exactly as it was when Thomas Gray's eyes looked down on it:

"Beneath those rugged elms, that yew-tree's shade,
Where heaves the turf in many a mould'ring heap,
Each in his narrow cell for ever laid,
The rude forefathers of the hamlet sleep."

Here the graves are un-headstoned. Nothing except the grassy mounds show where sleep the labourers of earlier generations, their harvesting, their sowing and weeding, their mourning and love-making all done. If you can separate yourself entirely from the mawkish sentimentality of the modern part of the churchyard, here you will find the full force of that tide of feeling which Gray has so admirably expressed. And the country round about still represents the scenery he had in his mind, even though it is traversed daily by noisy motor-cars and other recent inventions. But the splendid trees, the rich fertile country, and even the cottages show little that has changed. The only difficulty is that we feel no longer the sense of seclusion which made Gray write:

"Some village-Hampden, that, with dauntless breast,
The little tyrant of his fields withstood,
Some mute inglorious Milton here may rest,
Some Cromwell guiltless of his country's blood."

It is a sentiment that has been widely disputed, as some people are of opinion that when genius is sent into the world it is bound to make its way, whatever be the barriers opposed to its progress. But were this so, then Nature would treat men as she treats nothing else. On the oaks in the park near at hand millions of acorns come into existence every year. Each of them has a potentiality of becoming an oak, but probably not one in ten years' growth is able to fulfil that destiny. And it is the same with almost everything else. Out of her fertile womb Nature produces with endless fecundity, casting away a million lives that one may live. So must it also be with the soul of man. Let us imagine one to be born with the genius of a poet or a painter into those surroundings that Gray pictured so vividly. It has been said that the best bat at cricket could never make a high score unless he gets the bowling. What were the chances of a rustic in Gray's time? He might have intellect, but intellect is like gold that has never been mined till its powers are set free by education; and the children of the poor in those days were often put to work at five or six years of age—the infants were armed with wooden clappers and sent out to scare birds, harder labour being given them as they acquired sufficient strength to bear it. Self-education was rendered nearly impossible by the fact that whole families were often crowded into a one-roomed cottage. The boy forced outside took to premature courtship as the only practicable amusement. Early marriages resulted and the young man with the heaven-sent genius had to drudge for the livelihood of a young family. No doubt some overcame these obstacles, but they must have proved too much for the ordinary man, and hence, with the clowns and yokels of the parish, are buried there those who in different conditions might have moved far beyond their fellows. They have passed into oblivion, but so have many who were considered their superiors. Every one who has made inquiries about the people of the past must have been struck by the forgetfulness that closes down over the rich as well as the poor. "We are all rushing to obscurity," said the late Lord Tennyson during one of the last years of his life, "some a little quicker than the others, but all of us are to be involved in it." Life is like a road that we have to pass along once and once only, and on the way is no memorial of the travellers who have made the journey and can never return. So the "Elegy" is in reality a dirge for the sons of rural labour and a sign of the poet's understanding of their fate and his compassion for them. In his holiday visits to Stoke Poges he would have seen much to remind him of their pitiable lot. Some such idea possessed my mind as, in the dusk of a winter evening, I sat under the poet's yew-tree close adjoining the ancient little church wherein he used to pray. Among the tombs is that of his mother, and there are few epitaphs more affecting than that which he inscribed to "the careful tender mother of many children, one of whom alone had the misfortune to survive her."

Outside the limits of the "Elegy" I think I like Gray best in his letters, which are some of the very best in the English language. There you find the same elements that qualify his "Ode on the Death of a Favourite Cat" for inclusion in a Lyra Elegantiarum. Real elegance, abundant fancy and just enough generous feeling to redeem it from triviality render this poem delightful of its kind. No doubt Dr. Johnson might urge the same objection to some of it that he made to the "Elegy":

"With many an ardent wish,
She stretched, in vain, to reach the prize.
What female heart can gold despise?
What Cat's averse to Fish?"

The objection is to an alleged triteness, but nothing is trite that is appropriate. Witness the last line of the penultimate verse:

"Eight times emerging from the flood
She mewed to every watery God,
Some speedy aid to send.
No Dolphin came, nor Nereid stirred:
Nor cruel Tom, nor Susan heard.
A favourite has no friend!"

On the other hand it is not imaginable that any man of taste should urge a similar objection against the "Ode on a Distant Prospect of Eton College," so many lines of which have passed into the folk-speech of England, such as:

"Alas! regardless of their doom
The little victims play;
No sense have they of ills to come,
Nor care beyond to-day."

And

"Thought would destroy their paradise.
No more;—where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise."

FICTION

The Flute of Pan. A Romance. By JOHN OLIVER HOBBS.
(Unwin, 6s.)

MRS. CRAIGIE is one of those who will not take no for an answer. When her play was ill-received, she attributed its condemnation to the hostility or ignorance of her audience, and straightway went to the highways and by-ways and bade those who liked her come and rectify the misjudgment of the herd. Still the verdict was unfavourable, and yet once again she has carried her case to a higher court of appeal by publishing the play as a novel. As one of those who did not see it at the theatre, the present writer opened "The Flute of Pan" with curiosity. Reluctantly he has come to the conclusion that if the play were no better than the novel it amply deserved its fate. Perhaps the subject might be discreetly left at that—on the theory that when a definite conclusion is arrived at reasons become superfluous. But though that may be politic, it is not courteous; and therefore it is necessary to try one's hand at a little analysis. And the first point is that we like not the company. The fondness of Mrs. Craigie for the "hupper suckles" is her most patent frailty. Her hero is a Lord Feldershey, whose Christian name is Boris; her heroine, H.R.H. the Princess Margaret of Siguria. The female villain, or, if that be too crude and harsh a phrase, the minx of the tale, is the Countess Rixensart. Her husband is the male minx, a man who "spoke the word 'loving' as though it were pudding, a thing he no longer took." We need say little about the other members of the aristocracy who fume out their little parts, Lady Feldershey, Lady Amersham, Lady Addlington, Lady Wimborough, the Duchess of Drossett, Prince Adolf, and the rest—even to write their names is, as it were by deputy, "to move in good society." A commoner, Mr. Baverstock, does indeed play a not inconsiderable part in the comedy, but he has amalgamated "jam" with "pickles," these being two branches of the family business, and is a millionaire—at least he thinks nothing of giving twelve thousand pounds for a string of pearls to hang round the neck of his mistress, and that is near enough to being a millionaire for our purpose. If these members of the aristocracy were in themselves interesting it would not matter, but unfortunately they have nothing except their rank to recommend them—not even picturesque vices. They are artificial and they live in an artificial atmosphere. Just as still nature never receives a glance in the novel, so not a single natural stroke reveals humanity in these puppets. And then the plot turns on one of those mean, finicking devices that create and leave behind a sense of irritation. All the misunderstanding arises out of the simple fact that the generous and virtuous Princess, inspired by the worthiest motive, keeps an assignation made with her Maid of Honour. On this frail foundation is built a heavy superstructure which the reader feels might and ought to tumble down at the first adverse breath of wind. To say that such a construction is inartistic is to find the least fault possible with it. Before the intrigue has developed beyond a few chapters an irritation has set in that gradually increases till the end is reached.

But it may quite truthfully be pointed out that plot or even character has never been the strong point of John Oliver Hobbes, but that her strength lies in style and epigram. We are afraid that the most scintillating of her phrases are the least fitted to stand close examination. Take this, which is delivered with an unmistakable air of smartness: "I could never be a Court-painter," said Feldershey proudly, "for I know too much about Courts in the first place, and perhaps a little too much about painting in the other." What a ghost of dead cleverness this is to be sure! A million lips have flung back retorts on the same model. And it is the same with many of the other sayings in this volume. They are machine-made, they follow lines often followed before; the wit is mere pertness. From the beginning of the book to the end we have not met with a stroke of genuine drollery, or of the humour that is composed of mingled laughter and sympathy.

Baliol Garth. By ALGERNON GISSING. (Chatto & Windus, 6s.)

MR. ALGERNON GISSING is one of those few happy authors who do not over-write themselves. The three or four novels he has given us—"Knitters in the Sun," for instance, or "A Secret of the North Sea"—are all tales a little out of the common; tales brilliantly placed, as it were, en plein air, and conceived and executed with a sort of resolute leisure to which, no doubt, is partly due the successful maintenance of what is frequently a difficult equipose. This is particularly the case with the book before us. The scaffolding of the story is seen at once to rest upon a foundation of complex mental balances which do not readily lend themselves to readjustment in miniature within the limits of a short review. The central figure, Baliol Garth, tutor for many years to a motherless boy between whom and himself there is the closest affection, suddenly finds himself in a position which practically compels him to promote or retard a re-marriage between the boy's father, Gerald Osprey, and the daughter of Osprey's senior partner in a shipping concern, the consummation of which within a week is represented to him by his employer as the only hope of saving both partners from financial ruin, Osprey from arrest for embezzlement, and the boy Ninian from the consequences of his father's disgrace. Into the subtleties of the situation, subtleties rendered more intricate still by various dispositions and relationships, we cannot enter here. But when all is said, the ethical issue from an objective point of view is so plain that it is no formal achievement on Mr. Gissing's part to retain all our interest while first a rather far-fetched idealism is pitted against a woman's instinctive reluctance, next, while intense reactionary emotion overbeats diplomacy, and, last, while altruism struggles hard against passion, in this highly complicated affair. In point of fact it is quite likely that many readers will hardly realise the bearing that it all has upon the ultimate issue of the tale, so great is the charm that is interwoven about the high comradeship between Ninian, Garth, and Mabel Calderwood. Set deep in the scenery of the coast-line, near the Scottish border, this clouded, sun-flecked, half-tragic idyll is delightful while it lasts, not the least of its fascinations being a resemblance, irresistibly evoked, between this and another similar group of three in a wholly different environment—Crossjay, Vernon, and Clara Middleton. If it had all ended with the marriage of Garth and Mabel, with fresh horizons for Ninian, few, perhaps, would have troubled their heads as to what became of the one disreputable actor in these scenes. But Gerald Osprey has gone to prison entrusting his boy (who knows little of him and nothing of his disgrace) to the man who has, in his view, played the traitor. And so the coil is carried to the end, the second stage being occupied by Ninian, the third by Gerald Osprey. That events might possibly have worked together for the dénouement we reluctantly concede. Yet some may experience a half-admiring discontent that a protagonist, the poet in whom is so hardly contained by the self-disciplined scholar and philosopher, should never have been granted (even in the interests of others) those higher flashes of imagination which would have enabled him upon occasion to play the man of the world.

The Country-House Party. By DORA SIGERSON SHORTER. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

NEITHER the country-house nor the party has much to do with this collection of short stories. They might just as well have been published with separate titles and without the thin connecting thread. They are of varying interest and value, but, like Mrs. Shorter's other work, they are rich in ideas. Some are light and amusing, some are touched with real poetry, some are weighted with tragedy to which the author's craftsmanship is hardly equal. In the first story Mrs. Shorter has succeeded where many fail, for she has persuaded us to sympathise with the woman who is oppressed and wearied by her commonplace surroundings. As a rule, when we read of these women we feel sorry for the poor "surroundings," who probably have to wear shirts without buttons. But Mrs. Shorter shows us a soul's tragedy, the martyrdom of a clever, imaginative woman doomed to be the wife and mother of fools. The story of Mike O'Dwyer is a witty Irish anecdote of feminine perversity and ingenuity. Mrs. Shorter proves here that she has when she chooses a light touch and a vein of kindly humour. But she chooses often to handle the mighty themes of love, jealousy, and violent death, and we cannot say of her that she always rises to her occasion. The situation over and over again is fine, but the treatment slight and unrelievedly sentimental. The deep poetical feeling that seems to have fathered the author's ideas but failed of their full development does find expression in one story. The man who leads a safe and unadventurous life is confronted with the man exposed to all life's storms and miseries: and one spirit cries to the other desiring change. This they achieve, and after many years meet again without regret. The two scenes in the rich man's study appeal to the imagination; and it is their truth, not their unreality that remains in the mind. Mrs. Shorter has poetical insight. But some one unpoetical and attentive should read her proofs and put in proper stops. We object to the following sentence as it stands:

"Such excitement, all the girls in their prettiest dresses, and the matrons anxious and happy, for it was a market day to go to Mrs. Henderson's, as all the best young men of the county would be there, and here were a few pretty young maids to sell."

A Prima Donna's Romance. By F. W. HAYES. (Hutchinson, 6s.)

MR. HAYES has for once abandoned historical romance, with which his name is chiefly associated, and given us a story of modern life, rich in romantic episodes and strong situations. The plot is ingenious, and unfolds itself with the right amount of twisting and turning to keep the reader's attention always alert. The lovely prima donna, Dione Kastalia, and her twin sister, Zoe, believe themselves to be the daughters of a Greek brigand, and suffer many things because of his cruelty and greed. Their lovers also sustain material and intellectual damage at his hands, which culminates in their capture and sentence to death. Among other services it falls to the lot of one of the lovers to rescue Zoe from drowning, and Dione from death by fire, and both men show courage and devotion worthy of knights of old. The twins' real father, in ignorance of the tie, constitutes himself their protector, and therefore the enemy of the brigand. He is an eccentric creature, and withal attractive and possible; his shrewd, lively sayings count for something in the reader's enjoyment of these pages. The author's touch is bold and firm in handling his heroes and brigands: he is not so happy with the twin sisters, who are but slight sketches of a conventional type of gentle heroine. Mr. Hayes' cleverly worked out and exciting romance is adorned with a frontispiece by his own hand, and the volume is dedicated to the memory of that sturdy genius, John Brett, A.R.A.

A Vagrant Englishwoman. By CATHERINE I. DODD. (Smith, Elder, 6s.)

THE real theme of this book is the emancipation of women in Germany. That is the subject which, like the silver thread of a river seen in a landscape from a high place, keeps appearing and disappearing and reappearing. The landscape through which it meanders is the conversation and doings of a handful of people in a small German University town. The Englishwoman presents herself to us at a pension in the midst of a carefully selected group of boarders. There are the Frau Doktor, the proprietress, the Cynic, the Poet, the Silent American, the Boy, and others, all happily conceived and portrayed—individually. The fault is, perhaps, that for truth to life they are a little too carefully selected. The dramatic aptness with which they are contrasted makes for unreality, for it occasions broad and frequently misleading generalities. The Cynic, for instance, may exist—probably he does, but we doubt whether he would exist with quite the complacent calm that he enjoys in the book. In an ordinary German pension frequented by students they would look askance at such a man. The educated German's code of deportment towards ladies differs essentially in one respect only from that of the Englishman—he recognises no obligation of politeness to absolute strangers. He would not regard it as incumbent upon him, for example, to make way for a strange lady on the public footpath. But if the lady have the least claim to his acquaintance, if she be sitting, say, at the same hostess's table, his polish of manner is unimpeachable. Such points as these, however, need not trouble the average reader. Miss Dodd keeps her puppets moving in a very entertaining atmosphere of dry wit and shrewd common sense, and she shows a keen eye for the details of German life which are worth describing.

The Conscience of a King. By ARCHIBALD C. GUNTER. (Ward, Lock, 6s.)

THE reminiscences of a French police agent in the seventeenth century are bound by their nature to provide sensational incidents, and M. Pomereu takes a modest delight in detailing his share in the plots and crimes herein described. Tears, terror, false accusation, torture of lovely ladies, duels, devotion of gallant lovers, awake echoes of the tales of long ago. Pomereu's chief exploit is the hunting down of a beautiful countess designed by Mme. de Maintenon, "The King's Conscience," for a terrible punishment, and the last page leaves the defenceless girl condemned to untold torments of mind and body. The characters are mere puppets which lighten in some degree the wear and tear of the reader's feelings—the only creature who lives in M. Pomereu's story is the spaniel Bambazoo. Probably because the author knows a Bambazoo, and does not know a Pomereu or his victims. The only way to enjoy the story is to accept everything as it comes, and question nothing: in such wise readers may find it a sufficiently exciting and moving tale.

THE DRAMA

THE EARLIEST FRENCH PLAYERS IN LONDON

ALTHOUGH the custom had long prevailed in France and Italy, it was not until 1629 that an attempt was made to introduce female performers on to the English stage. On the fourth of November of that year, as appears from the office-book of Sir H. Herbert, the Master of Revels, he received "£2 as his fee for allowing of a French company to play a farce at Blackfriars." Prynne, in a marginal note to his "Histriomastix" (1633) refers to this event in somewhat opprobrious terms:

"Some French women, or monsters rather, in Michaelmas term 1629, attempted to act a French play at the playhouse in Blackfriars; an impudent, shameful, unwomanish, graceless, if not more than w— attempt."

But, in spite of the jeremiads of "prick-eared Prynne," we learn that "there was a great resort to some French women actresses in a play not long since personated in Blackfriars playhouse."

It was, however, only curiosity that drew a crowded house, for it appears that the venture proved an utter failure on account of the Londoners' hypersensitive notions of feminine decorum. One Thomas Brande voiced the general opinion in a letter presumably addressed to the then Bishop of London:

"Furthermore," wrote that worthy, "you should know, that last daye certain vagrant French players, who had been expelled from their owne contrey, and those women, did attempt, thereby giving just offence to all virtuous and well disposed persons in this town, to act a certain lascivious and unchaste comedye, in the French tongue at the Blackfryers. Glad I am to saye they were hissed, hooted, and pippin-pelted from the stage; so as I do not thinke they will soone be ready to trie the same againe. Whether they had licence for so doing I know not; but I do know that, if they had licence it were fit that the Master [of the Revels] be called to account for the same."

Nothing daunted, however, by such outbursts of public feeling, the French company appeared again a fortnight later at the Red Bull Theatre, though with as little success as before. Their third attempt was made three weeks after the second, at the Fortune playhouse; and again they failed. Sir H. Herbert's office-book contains the following entry in reference to this performance:

"For allowinge of a French companie att the Fortune to play one afternoon this 14 day of December 1629—£1";

whilst, in a note to the above, Herbert informs us

"I should have had another piece, but in respect of their ill-fortune I was content to bestow a piece back."

The unfortunate experience of these pioneers of the French drama in England appears for some years to have disheartened others of their profession from crossing the Channel; but in 1635, another company played privately before the Queen, "and being recommended by her Majesty to the King," were allowed to perform at the Cockpit in Whitehall, where they appeared, "with good approbation," in a light comedy called Melise. Nor was this all; for Herbert proceeds, "they had the benefit of playing on the sermon days, and got £200 at least, besides many rich clothes that were given them." This second company, mindful of English susceptibilities, included no actresses; and for many years to come women's parts on our stage continued to be played by boys.

Being compelled to give up the Cockpit Theatre at Easter to Beeston and the Queen's English players, the French actors performed the Trompeur puni at Court, "with better approbation than the other"; and, such was their enterprise, that within a month of this date we find them installed at Drury Lane, where the King had given up to them the "manage house," a part of the riding-school, in order that it might be converted into a playhouse. This was on December 21, 1635, and Herbert is careful to remark:

"These Frenchmen were commended to me by the Queen, and have passed through my hands gratis," though it transpires that he allowed them to give his deputy £3 for his pains!

Such was the chequered history of the first French players who appeared on our stage. Under the Restoration they seem to have been treated with more consideration. Writing on August 30, 1661, Pepys notes in his Diary:

"Then my wife and I to Drury Lane to the French comedy, which was so ill-done, and the scenes and company and everything else so nasty and out of order and poor, that I was sick all the while in my mind to be there. Here my wife met with a son of my Lord Somersett, a pretty man; I showed him no great countenance to avoyd further acquaintance. That done there being nothing pleasant but the foolery of the farce, we went home."

One cannot help suspecting, however, that the prettiness of "my Lord Somersett's son" had not a little to do with the worthy Samuel's poor opinion of the French comedians; and it would be unfair to accept this as a serious criticism of their art.

The Gentlemen's Magazine for October 1738 contains the following notice, which shows that the troubles of French actors in London were not yet over:

"October 9th, By Authority—By the French company of comedians—L'Embaras de Richesse. Soon after the Licensing Act it was resolved to bring a set of players from abroad, and place them upon this stage, from whence our own had been just expelled. But when the bill appeared for the first performance of these French actors, with the word 'Authority' placed at the top, the public were stung to the quick, and thought themselves concerned to resent the insult put upon them by the Lord Chamberlain."

A riot ensued, and

"the public would not permit the French players to perform, at a time when many poor English actors had been deprived of their livelihood by Act of Parliament, and were in gaol for debt."

Thus the ill-starred French company fell victims to English political faction. A translation of the comedy which was to have been given was made by Ozell in 1735, under the title of The Plague of Riches, with the text and translation printed on opposite pages.

It was in 1828 that Mlle. Mars, the first of the many great French actresses who have played in London, made her appearance on our stage. She carried all before her. Hazlitt, who did not wear his heart upon his sleeve, was wildly enthusiastic on her interpretation of the part of Célimène in Le Misanthrope:

"Her first few simple sentences," he wrote, "her 'Mon ami' at her lover's first ridiculous suggestion, the mingled surprise, displeasure and tenderness in the tone—her little peering eyes, full of languor and archness of meaning—the peaked nose and thin compressed lips, opening into an indulgent cordial smile—her self-possession, her slightest gesture—the ease and rapidity of her utterance, every word of which was perfectly distinguished—the playful, wondering good nature with which she humours the Misanthrope's eccentricities throughout, and the finer tone of sense and feeling in which she rejects his final proposal, must stamp her a favourite with the English as with the French part of the audience."

Yet, he adds:

"Mlle. Mars is neither handsome nor delicately formed. She has not the light airy grace, nor the evanescent fragility of appearance which distinguished Miss Farren, but more point and meaning, or more of the intellectual part of comedy."

But in spite of her hearty reception by the English public, her season was not a comfortable one, owing to the vexations she experienced at the hands of her manager, Laporte. In a letter to him, dated July 5, after expressing her surprise at the tone of his last communication, she hints that her dealings with him seem destined to be disagreeable. One of the articles of contract stipulated that she was not to play at any theatre or in any private drawing-room, either gratuitously or otherwise.

"This," she says, "I have never been accustomed to, and if you insist upon it I will at once cancel my engagement. . . . You think, perhaps, that because I am a stranger here, I shall find no one to support me, but you are mistaken."

It is little more than half a century since Rachel appeared in London, and aroused boundless enthusiasm; and on the favour won since then by French players on the English stage there is no need to dwell.

"L'AGE D'AIMER" AT TERRY'S THEATRE

THE contemporary French stage is commonly supposed to be immeasurably superior to our own, and, although superficially this is undoubtedly the case, whether in essentials it is so may well be questioned. Certainly the men now writing for the one are, as a body, more intellectual—more interested in life and far more interesting in their views of it—than those now writing for the other; but their knowledge of the theatre as a medium seems to be, if as great, at least no greater. M. Pierre Wolff's L'Age d'Aimer is a fair specimen of the obliquely and gently didactic pieces of which just now our neighbours are so fond. It deals, in a characteristic but to the Englishman somewhat unpleasant milieu, with the inability of the middle-aged to absorb the whole devotion of the young, and, although the writing is clever and distinguished, the general treatment of the subject is entirely ineffective. For what M. Wolff has done is to record the sufferings of a woman of forty unable to "hold" a lover ten years her junior—and to record them only. We see her struggling with herself just before, in spite of a bitter previous experience, she yields to his attack; troubled by the discovery of the letter which first tells her of a younger rival; tortured by the sight of the first embrace, and finally resigned when, although her lover has returned to his allegiance, she realises that it will not be for long. "Tu me feras souffrir encore . . . tu te rapprocheras de moi, comme en ce moment, pour me faire croire . . . puis tu me rendras à mes peines." But, although we see that Geneviève is moved, the exact nature of her emotions we never realise. We feel, if we feel at all, not with but for her. Not once does the author put us in her place, not once does he succeed in making her experience an experience personal to ourselves—in enabling us, in short, to appreciate her feeling through our own. The piece is not a play; it is a story, a mere statement—and statement not only wastes the theatre but is wasted in it. Madame Réjane's performance is necessarily superficial, but it is at moments consummate of its kind.

FINE ART

PAINTING IN LITTLE

OF the many branches of art production which at the present day reflect the very spirit of the æsthetic culture of days gone by, none exercises a deeper fascination over the imagination than does that of miniature painting. The reason of this is not far to seek. As is pointed out by Mr. Dudley Heath in his valuable and exhaustive monograph, "Miniatures" (Methuen, 25s. net)—the latest addition to the Connoisseur's Library—the appeal it makes is a personal one, conveying to the mind more completely than any other the realities of the past.

"In it," he says, "we see reflected the fashions and vanities, the graces and quaintnesses of our ancestors, and in the miniatures of mediæval manuscripts we have mirrored for us the religious and social life of each period, which adds an historical value we can hardly over-estimate. . . . The companionable proportions of the miniature portrait," he adds, "make peculiar appeal to my affections"; and here perhaps he puts his finger on the secret of its charm, for it can be carried everywhere by its possessor, worn next the heart by the lover of the person portrayed, and if need be it is easily concealed.

"Unlike the life-size portrait, it is," says Mr. Heath, "truly described as being always in scale, superficially and artistically, with its surroundings, and while it does not so grossly challenge our comparison, it may still be an invaluable historical and biographical record."

Although this most sympathetic writer admits that miniature painting was first introduced into England by Holbein, he justly claims that its greatest exponents since have undoubtedly been Englishmen, who, though "painters in little, will bear comparison with the greatest portrait-painters of their time."

These preliminary quotations are enough to show how thorough a grip the critic has of his subject, and how fully he recognises the many directions in which the influence of the miniaturist is felt. He recognises how intimately the history of painting in little is bound up with that of the country in which it was practised, and he traces with unerring hand its evolution from its very earliest starting-point in illuminated manuscripts to the latest phase of its modern revival. He hints indeed at an even more remote origin, for he suggests that the first illuminations were the late outcome of pre-historic efforts at pictorial representation; but he wisely refrains from dwelling long upon a topic, which, however interesting, is, it must be owned, somewhat irrelevant.

It has long been the custom to treat the two subjects of illumination and miniature-painting as distinct, or at least to infer that the link between them, if it ever existed, is now lost. But Mr. Heath declares that there actually exist many examples of portraits painted into manuscripts, especially those of the fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, and he points out that there was a very close connection indeed between the Renaissance painters and the illuminators and miniaturists of that period. He dwells also on the beautiful decorative sense with which the early portrait miniaturists arranged their subject in the square, round or oval shape, whilst their technique recalled the very best traditions of the finest illuminated manuscripts.

After giving a description of the chequered childhood of illumination in its parent land of Egypt, and of its first migrations to other countries, which reads like some Oriental romance, so clearly is the relation between the art and human emotion brought out, Mr. Heath describes in minute detail the finest existing examples and the methods employed by their artists. The Byzantine, Anglo-Celtic, Anglo-Saxon, Carolingian and Gothic miniaturists are passed in able review; the new features and improvements are noted that were introduced in the fourteenth century, when, says Mr. Heath, the Renaissance was slowly but surely budding and putting forth new leaves; the influence of the invention of printing on the art of the miniaturist is traced, the narrative growing in interest as the golden age of painting is approached; the sad but inevitable decadence in the early years of the eighteenth century; the brief but glorious revival that succeeded that decadence; the ups and downs of the nineteenth century with the wonderful fusion of the present and the past which took place in its last decade, and out of which sprang the art of the present day, are each and all with their distinctive peculiarities brought vividly before the reader, every section of the work being full of pregnant suggestion as well as of carefully sifted and trustworthy data.

In his criticism of the various masters noticed, Mr. Heath shows an intimate insight into the peculiarities that set each of them apart from his contemporaries, as when he says of Nicolas Hilliard: "His great skill of elaboration charms principally by its minuteness and finesse of handling rather than its richness of quality and colour," adding that for all that:

"it will not inspire the student, for the excellencies are those of a craftsman well trained in the use of his tools rather than of an artist inspired by nature and instinct with individuality";

as was that of the man whom Hilliard took as his model, the mighty master, Holbein. In his general remarks also Mr. Heath shows himself entirely behind the scenes in his knowledge of how things are, as well as how they should be, done. He distinguishes, for instance, between true and legitimate realism and that of a trivial and insipid type, urging the modern miniaturist to remember that elaboration should be carried no further than is useful to truth and beauty and not injurious to breadth and dignity. His account of what has been done of recent years is especially interesting in view of the many pitfalls that await the feet of the unwary enthusiast, and his remarks on the opportunities of the twentieth century should be read and pondered by every one interested in the revival of the art.

"We are," he says, "heirs to the accumulated experience, knowledge, and genius that have slowly and surely added branch to branch, leaf to leaf, and blossom to blossom, and to-day give us the fruits of centuries of effort and inspiration. . . . The artist," he adds, "cannot ignore previous manners of expression; from them he will choose and build up his own language and evolve in practice a manner peculiar to himself."

Avoiding direct criticism of living artists, always an invidious task, Mr. Heath pleads for a healthier and more robust view to be taken of the portrait-miniaturist's art. He asks for truth and dignity, as well as technical skill, for the revelation of character as well as the reproduction of beautiful features. He calls attention to the significant fact that men are nowadays scarcely ever painted in miniature, and he would fain see this restriction removed. He deprecates what he calls the Cosway craze, although he admits that there is very little of that clever but over-rated artist left in the phantom which stimulates the craze; and he entreats the modern miniaturist to try to wean public favour from the commercial and mechanical portrait and to place his own art completely outside competition with it. In a word, he holds up a high, though fortunately not an impossible ideal, as will be proved by an examination of the examples he gives of quite recent work, which may usefully be here compared with certain masterpieces of the eighteenth century.

The numerous illustrations enriching this most handsome volume, some in the three-colour process, others in photogravure and collotype, include a great variety of typical miniatures, all reproduced in their original size. Amongst the first, especially beautiful are the "Philip the Good" after a Flemish miniature on vellum of the fifteenth century, the "Portrait of an unknown Gentleman" by Richard Cosway, that of "Sir John Sinclair" by Andrew Plimer, an exceptionally good example of that very unequal master, and that of "Charles Heath" by Andrew Robertson, all excellent interpretations of strongly individualised male characters. Of the black-and-white reproductions, among the best are two bust portraits of men by the comparatively little known Thomas Flatman, the "Likeness of an unknown Gentleman" by C. Jansen, an excellent rendering of a remarkable piece of work, full of life and character; and of modern miniatures the "Portrait of a Young Lady" by Lionel Heath and that of "A Little Girl" by Helena Horwitz.

ART SALES

IN the sale at Messrs. Christie's of the collection of unset stones formed by the late Mr. C. H. T. Hawkins, several items touched high prices. A yellow brilliant, 135½ carats, realised £1380 (Tannebaum); and another £370 (Fileman); a fine deep-blue sapphire £330 (Nockold), and two others £355 (S. H. Harris); and a cat's-eye, in Indian chased gold box, £560 (Mayer).

At Messrs. Christie's, on Friday, in the sale of porcelain and objects of vertu, the property of the late Duke of Buckingham and Chandos, a set of three old Chinese oviform fluted vases reached 950 gs. (Duveen); and a portrait of Anne of Denmark, queen of James I., by J. Oliver, 480 gs. (Hodgkins). Of the more important articles in miscellaneous properties, a Louis XV. gold snuff-box, by J. P. Ducrollay, Paris, circa 1760, realised £1400 (C. J. Wertheimer); an old Chinese cylindrical vase, with the companion imperfect, £950 (Duveen); a Chelsea vase, painted in four panels with birds in landscapes, 880 gs. (Thompson); and a Sèvres oviform vase, gilding by Vincent, £700 (Hodgkins).

A portrait of Thackeray by L. Poyet, painted about 1840, during the novelist's residence in Paris, fell to Mr. Pearson, at Messrs. Sotheby's on the same day, for £95.

On Saturday Messrs. Christie disposed of Lord Tweedmouth's collection of pictures of the Early English school and works by Old Masters. A Raeburn—portrait of the artist's wife—fell to Mr. Charles Davis, at 8700 gs. A portrait of Raeburn himself was purchased by Messrs. Agnew, on behalf of the National Gallery of Scotland, for 4500 gs. The portrait of Mrs. Lucy Oswald went for 3600 gs. (C. Davis); and Mr. Davis also purchased at 6600 gs. the portrait of Emilia Maria Margaret, daughter of James, first Duke of Leinster, catalogued as by Reynolds; and "Simplicity" (2000 gs.). The single example of George Morland realised 4000 gs. (C. Davis); the finer of two Hoppners, 3750 gs. (Messrs. Agnew); and Hogarth's "Conversation Piece; an assembly at Wanstead House" fell to Messrs. Agnew for 2750 gs. Later in the day a Hoppner, formerly the property of the late Mr. Eugene Collins, rose from 100 gs. to 5800 gs. (A. Wertheimer). The Reynolds portrait of Lady Waldegrave realised 1270 gs. (Messrs. Agnew); the Alexander Nasmyth portrait of Burns, the property of the Misses Cathcart, 1600 gs. (Morton); and a Raeburn portrait of Anna Maria, Countess of Minto, the property of Mr. W. G. Elliot, 1550 gs.

On the continuation of the Hawkins sale on Monday, two gold snuff-boxes realised good prices; one, a Louis XV., chased and enamelled, £1100 (Hamburger); another, a Louis XVI., with panels of dark green enamel, the centre of the lid with an oval plaque painted with Perseus and Andromeda, £410 (Stettiner).

SCIENCE

A CONTROVERTED QUESTION

IT might be urged that it is better not to raise the most difficult questions at all than to treat of them in a few hundred words. But plainly that argument would inhibit the writing of essays on anything but the ephemeral or the self-evident; and since the province of the essay is surely to suggest and appetise rather than to expound or satiate, I may dare here to consider one, or two, problems in æsthetics. The controversy is as to the existence or non-existence of a relation between art and morality.

As I hinted the other day, the man who believes that art is related to morality, commonly proceeds to defend his belief by a posteriori reasoning. He quotes instances where the relation is obvious, as in the work of Watts or Wagner or Wordsworth. But, as I also hinted, the disputant is apt to meet with difficulties. His illustrations may be fit enough, but his opponents quote others which are most disconcerting. Hence I, for one, as I said, have been led to fortify myself in my belief that there is a relation by the argument: "If art be true, it is a part of Truth and related to other parts of Truth, such as morality: Truth being One." Mr. Tilney suspects—in a happy phrase—that these are "Icarus' wings"; so it behoves me to demonstrate, if possible, that my reasoning is not waxen-jointed, and does not yield before the melting fervour of the Truth; which, I take it, is symbolised by the sun in Mr. Tilney's apt metaphor.

The quotation of what are supposed to be conclusive instances in proof of the "æsthetico-ethical" relation, is unsatisfactory, because it is used in support of the contention that the relation consists in the explicit inculcation of moral truths by any true work of art. Hereupon there enters not only the critic who instances, say, a Whistler Nocturne or a piece of "absolute music," and defies us to name the moral truth which it inculcates (since the beauty of holiness can scarcely be inferred from the beauty of paint), but also, and even more disconcertingly, such a critic as Mr. Davies, who quotes a drama, the Hippolytus of Euripides, which, we are told, "shocked the moral and æsthetic sense of Athens," but which is yet a great work of art. In the face of such examples it is impossible to hold that all true art must overtly teach morality. But that was never my contention: which is that, if there be any sense in which the words true and untrue can be applied to any work of art, then true works of art must necessarily be related to all other truths and true things.

Let us take the case cited by Mr. Davies: where the tragedian demonstrates the triumph of licentiousness and the ruin of the innocent and the guilty alike. But I am not compelled to "follow out logically" my "teaching," and describe that play as "false art." On the contrary, it seems to me to teach a truth—that is, to be true to life, that is, to be true art. The truth of this work of art is that also taught in the greatest of all Sermons (!): "He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." It is the truth that morality is not a matter of usury; that honesty is often not the best materialist policy; that the pure in heart are blessed not with yachts or titles but in this, that, whether in the literal or a spiritual sense, "they shall see God."

Or take the story of Icarus. Here was a youth who had courage and faith in his father's handiwork: but he and his courage and his wings were flung into the sea. The story is a primitive work of art. If courage and faith were always rewarded, then the story would be false, in the artistic sense, and therefore bad art. But since virtue is its own reward, the story cannot be so characterised. So far am I from maintaining that all true art teaches the triumph or dividend-paying quality of virtue, that I apprehend the conventional "happy ending" and the typical melodrama to be bad art exactly because they teach this triumph; which can be taught only at the cost of truth to life. But the tragedy of Hippolytus, or any Greek tragedy that shows us the good man struggling with adversity or overwhelmed by Fate (which surely typifies natural non-moral causation)—is true art (and, as such, is a part of All Truth), exactly because it teaches that virtue is its own and only reward.

In a word, the art which deals with human emotions can be called true only when it is true to life—to the facts of life: and since morality also deals with the facts of life, such art is related to morality; things which are related to the same thing being, through it, related to one another.

But it may be urged, and with much plausibility, that there are certain works of art to which the terms true and untrue are inapplicable. According to Tolstoy, who seems to me to have proved his case, art is concerned with the communication of feeling or emotion. (Note this definition and its expression in Greek as sympathy—which is at the heart of morality.) But I have heard one of the most distinguished of living psychologists declare that the "content of an emotion" cannot be called a part of Truth—in the sense in which that word may be, as I think properly, "writ large." An object, for instance, may arouse pleasurable feeling in one man and painful feeling in another, or each to the same man at different times. But surely the occurrence of an emotional state is a fact: and, as such, is a part of Truth. If, then, the artist expresses—through the medium of his choice—any emotion which he has experienced, so that that emotion can be reproduced in others, his work, big or little, simple or complex, may properly be called true. If, however, he expresses an emotion which he did not feel, but would have us believe that he felt, then his work is untrue. Such, however, is the nature of things, that this work of his will fail of its intended effect: it is not Art but artifice; and the critic damns it eternally when he calls it insincere. He means that it purports to express an emotion which the so-disant artist did not feel: it is therefore untrue, and must properly be called false art. Thus art may be false or true in a higher and in a lower sense. A drawing may be untrue because it is false to the facts of perspective: a lyric may be untrue because it is false to the facts of emotion. The relation of the higher or creative arts to morality follows from the fact that both are concerned with emotion: but the relation applies even to an outline drawing of an artificial thing, such as a house. If such a drawing is a work of art, and not a mere diagram, it is so because it expresses the artist's pleasurable emotion when looking upon certain lines, or, at any rate, because it arouses such an æsthetic state in the observer, whether the drawing was the work of an artist or an architect's apprentice: and to deny that there is a relation between states of feeling—or what the psychologist calls "feeling-tone"—and morality, is to deny that happiness and morality are related; though it has been proved that the idea of happiness—whether of self or others or God—is an "inexpugnable element" in the conception of Good.

Last, as to Mr. Tilney's accusation that I "hedged behind a parenthesis" when I said that I was not concerned "with the separate question whether the artist should have moral questions in his mind's eye as he works."

I am not concerned with this question because, never having produced the smallest work of art, I am not the proper person to discuss it; and further because it seems to me to be a matter for the artist himself. I believe that some artists are aided by having moral questions in their mind's eye. You will not persuade me that Wagner and Æschylus and Shakespeare and Watts and a thousand more would have done the work they did had they cared not a straw for moral questions: art being the communication of emotion, the artist in whom emotion is aroused by moral questions is likely to work under their influence. Personally I care little for any other kind of artist, but that is beside the point; nor do I question for a moment that a painter may cover a canvas with beauty, though he had no other aim or thought. I apologise for expressing any opinion on this matter, which I had deliberately named as no affair of mine.

But when Mr. Tilney declares that this is not only not a separate question but actually the whole question, it is necessary to dissent, and I venture to hope that many readers will consider that certain questions of importance have been raised in the preceding paragraphs, though they are not at all concerned with what I will continue to think the separate question of the conditions most favourable to the genesis of art. The artist "with a purpose" may often achieve failure through it, yet he has often succeeded in spite of his purpose, or because his purpose has enhanced his emotion; but the artist for art's sake, concerned with nothing but the recording of what he has seen, or what his inward ear has heard, may yet, though he may care nothing for that, influence the moral of thousands. The posthumous quartets of the stone-deaf Beethoven are as "absolute" as music can be; but the average man that leaves the doors of the hall where the Joachim Quartet has played one of them, is more likely than before to give to the blind beggar at the corner, or to keep his temper over a belated dinner.

C. W. SALEEBY.

MUSIC

MUSIC FROM WITHOUT

THERE is probably no branch of art which in one form or another appeals so widely to mankind in general as music. The man who likes no music at all, or, further, who actively dislikes all music, is rare indeed; and yet it is extraordinary how few there are who take any more intelligent interest in music as an art than the vague pleasure derived from its elements of rhythm and melody, when these are presented in their most obvious form. Amongst that large, and, one is thankful to think, ever-increasing class of people, who, starting with but a moderate education, continue to educate themselves by the exercise of a natural taste in matters literary and artistic, the same taste is rarely applied in anything like the same degree to music. An instance occurs to my mind of the family of a man holding a high position in one of our Universities, all cultivated people and for the most part gifted with the means of a considerable amount of artistic expression, who nevertheless do not hesitate to invite their musical friends to jingle dance-tunes upon an ancient piano, while they show their appreciation by carrying on conversation and saying "Thank you" at the end. Like cases will occur to the minds of most people; and, on the other hand, the converse often appears to be no less true. Musical ability, whether in performance or appreciation, is often found in conjunction with a lack of refinement or of education in other directions, and this fact is so patent to every one and has in the past wrought such disaster to the cause of music, that I do not care to dwell upon it. I only wish to accentuate the fact that musical cultivation is further removed from general education than is that of its sister arts. A public speaker, be he statesman, preacher or lecturer, makes it his business to cultivate something of a literary style; he is ready with some apt quotations from classical prose and poetry; he alludes gracefully to the sculptures of Greece, and finds a fitting illustration amongst the masterpieces of Michelangelo. Then in a luckless hour he tries his hand at music: he speaks of the sublime melodies of Rossini, the lofty genius of Gounod, and if he has any musical auditors they find it a hard task to repress a smile. We have musicians in plenty; we have an eager public, ready to exercise their intelligence upon music, but, for the most part, needing guidance, and without the preliminary knowledge which would make them able to do so. The musicians cannot be their own interpreters. Browning said he could not be expected to write poetry and explain it, and though this was probably said whimsically, it is none the less true that an artist who gives way to a tendency towards foot-notes, runs the risk of ruining his work. It may be true that the greatest works are self-evident, and yet there is much in every art which is worth understanding, but which is very far from the ideal of sublime simplicity. We need, then, interpreters, and further, such interpreters as can speak, not with the didactic self-assurance of the man who knows and will impart his knowledge to us, but with the sympathy of one walking the same road with us, who through stronger eyesight or more minute observation has made a discovery which we might have passed over. It is that quality of "professionalism," ugly in all departments of life, hideous in connection with an art, which mars the utterances about music of men who have given their lives to its serious study. It is the opposite quality, the wide sympathy with all phases of life, from practical engineering to the sentiment of Tennyson's "In Memoriam," which enabled Sir George Grove to do more to help on the general appreciation of music in England than any man whose whole life has been devoted to the art.

Sir Edward Elgar, speaking at Birmingham lately, made an excellent proposal as a part of his scheme for musical education at the new University there. He spoke of it as a wish very near to his heart to get men eminent in other capacities to give their views on music in the form of lectures. It is, of course, probable that such a proposal carried into effect would in many cases reveal a lack of discrimination and a vagueness of idea which would minimise the instructive value of the lectures, but instruction would not be their aim, nor is it that which is most needed at present. What is wanted is a sympathetic discussion of musical subjects in connection with everyday life. I feel convinced that there are many readers of the ACADEMY who pass over the articles headed "Music," as outside their range, but who nevertheless read with intense interest Dr. Saleeby's illustration of his argument on the fear of death by an allusion to Elgar's "Dream of Gerontius." Again, to me, who can lay no claim to a scientific understanding, his able allusions to his experiences at the performances of Siegfried and the Valkyrie elucidate his position with regard to science in a way which no amount of scientific language could do. It may seem a platitude in these latter days to suggest that people's interest can only be aroused in a new subject by showing its relation to something in which they are already interested, and yet there are actually to be found those who would have each man preach his own little gospel in a tongue unknown to the majority of his fellows, and who shout their shibboleths of "Art for art's sake," "Science pure and undefiled," until their real meaning is forgotten, and men shrink from the littleness of that which, in reality, rests upon the broadest basis. The purport of music needs explaining. People do not want to be told: "This is good music; that is bad. Admire this; hate that." They have suffered this sort of direction long enough, and, from its oftentimes conflicting statements, have grown to distrust it. What they do want is to be put into the way of forming such judgments for themselves. It does not so much matter what those judgments are at first, so long as they are the individual exercise of thought. Then those who aspire to help others by writing or talking about music, must give up the hopeless habit of defining or explaining ignotum per ignotius; they must be themselves in touch with other interests, must prove their right to speak by the possession of a wider outlook imparted to them by their art, not a narrower. There is a narrowness, that which belongs to the man of real genius, which is excusable, nay almost essential to his doing the special work which is his mission. We forgive him for being a man of one idea, if that idea be one which has power greatly to enrich the world; but even here the narrowness is one of outward seeming rather than of reality. Beethoven passed for a recluse, a man apart, unapproachable, but his real sympathy with the life of the world at large appears in the "Eroica," as well as in the Fifth and Ninth Symphonies. With little men it is different. Their one link with greatness is their link with humanity, and if they lose that they are nothing. Those who give their lives to music are in danger of losing it. But music is for all, not for the few; the link must never be broken or lost, rather it must be strengthened by every possible means. It is outside the circle of so-called "musicians" that most can be done in this respect. Every cultivated and disciplined mind brought to bear on musical matters is a help, and we want more to undertake this work, since such are in fact the mediators between the artist and the public, between genius and the world.

BOOK SALES

SALE OF ILLUMINATED MANUSCRIPTS, HISTORICAL DOCUMENTS AND AUTOGRAPH LETTERS

THE sale of the above collection of books, ancient and modern, illuminated manuscripts, historical documents, autograph letters, miniature paintings, etc., took place at Messrs. Sotheby's on June 1, 2, and 3. The highest price obtained was for two miniature paintings portraying the Nativity, in a rim with five figures and several angels, surrounded by five scenes from the life of the Virgin and the childhood of Jesus Christ, by an artist of the Flemish School, early sixteenth century. £605 (Quaritch). Next to this came The Tragedie of Antonie, done into English by the Countesse of Pembroke, and Mornay's Discourse of Life and Death, done into English by the same (Sir Philip Sidney's sister). £560 (Jackson). The other leading lots sold were as follows: Psalterium Davidis Regis et Versione Vulgate Bibliae. A finely written English manuscript on vellum. £500 (Quaritch). Biblia Sacra Latina. MS. on vellum. £200 (Quaritch). Thackeray's Lectures on the English Humourists. Lecture II. Congreve and Addison. MS. The copy used by Thackeray to lecture from with corrections in his own hand. £115 (Pearson). Horæ Beatae Mariæ Virginis cum Calendario. A richly illuminated Dutch MS. on vellum. [1489.] £164 (Robson). Another MS. same subject. By Anglo-French scribe. £100 (Quaritch). Blake (William), The Marriage of Heaven and Hell. A copy of the extremely rare original issue. £150 (Stephens). Blake (Wm.), The Book of Thel. 1789. £67 (Dobell). Blake (William), Visions of the Daughters of Albion. Original edition, 1793. £105 (Leighton). Garrick. The Private Correspondence of David Garrick with the Most Celebrated Persons of his Time. 2 vols. 1831-1832. Extra illustrated. £31 (Pearson). Nine letters of Garrick to various persons realised £52 11s. 6d. Thackeray. An original Portrait, by L. Poyet. About 1840. £95 (Pearson). Cowley, Abraham, autograph letter to John Evelyn. 1666. £21 (Dunton). De Quincey, Thomas, Journal, written during 1803. £66 (Steele). FitzGerald's translation of Omar Kayyam. Rare first edition, published by Bernard Quaritch in 1859. £46 (Quaritch). Shelley. Autograph letter to Ollier, publisher. 1820. £24 (Sabin). Burns. Autograph love-letter. 1 page. £15 5s. (Peace). Camden's Britannia: enlarged by Gough. Second edition. Extra illustrated and extended to 10 vols. 1806. £30 (Daniell). De Bry's Voyag. 1590-1622. £20 (Quaritch). THE BOOKSHELF

Betting and Gambling; A National Evil. By B. Seeböhm Rowntree. (Macmillan, 5s.)—That Mr. Seeböhm Rowntree is sincere in his dislike of gambling is patent to all who may chance to read the work under notice; and we would not for a moment attribute to him that dishonesty of purpose which he does not hesitate to impute to the majority of persons who venture to differ from him in opinion. On page 106, par. 19, of the "Odds against the backer," it is stated: "Public backs the favourite, stable wins with outsider. See Dieudonné and Jeddah." The inference is as obvious as it is totally unfounded, and such reckless assertions will go far in the minds of all fair-thinking people to induce them to pause and consider before they accept as gospel either the ethics or the statistics of the author. The long chapter entitled "The Deluded Sportsman," which purports to be written by a "Bookmaker," is really funny, and did such a bookmaker exist, he would be assured of a numerous clientele, though it is doubtful if he would long remain in a position to pay his debts. We make no apology for quoting a genuinely amusing passage which will be found on page 178. It says: "The writer remembers travelling one day from Newcastle with a number of working men who were going to attend the races at Thirsk. They were evidently men who habitually betted and closely followed the betting in the papers. To anyone with the slightest knowledge of horses (the italics are our own) their discussion, although accompanied by airs of profound wisdom, was in the highest degree amusing, the climax coming when one man, whose opinion was evidently greatly valued by the rest, gave us his reason for not backing a certain horse—'he wags his tail over much for me.'" Now that man knew what he was talking about; the swishing of a horse's tail is more often than not a clear indication of a shifty and uncertain disposition. Our author is of opinion that "Gambling is a disease which spreads itself downwards to the industrious poor, from the idle rich." This is a statement which is at least open to doubt. From prehistoric times men have gambled, and it is more than probable that they will continue to do so until the end of all things mundane. We can at all events congratulate Mr. Seeböhm Rowntree upon having produced an amusing contribution to the faddist class of literature of the day.

The Preservation of Antiquities. By Dr. Friedrich Rathgen. Translated by George A. Auden, M.A., M.D., and Harold A. Auden, M.Sc., D.Sc. (Cambridge University Press, 4s. 6d. net.)—With German thoroughness the learned author of this little handbook, which has been admirably translated into English, devotes the first portion of his work to an examination of the changes that are produced in the various substances of which antiquities are composed by the action of the earth when they are buried, and by the air when they are exposed to the atmosphere. He illustrates these changes by examples that may be easily examined, many of them in the Royal Museum of Berlin, of which he is curator, and having thus clearly defined the dangers to be coped with by those responsible for the preservation of the priceless heirlooms confided to their care, he defines exactly what steps should be taken to prevent decay and to arrest it if it has begun. Beginning with inorganic substances, such as limestone, clay, Nile mud, sandstone, granite, iron, bronze and copper, he describes the various methods employed in their treatment by Krause, Krefting and other experts, passing thence to dwell on the best way of treating organic materials, such as bone, leather, amber, &c., concluding with a brief, but very instructive essay on the care of antiquities after preservative treatment.

Thirty years of work have gone to the compilation of Mr. Algernon Graves' book The Royal Academy of Art, a complete Dictionary of Contributors and their Work from its Foundation in 1769 to 1904 (Henry Graves & Co., and George Bell & Sons. Two guineas net, each volume). The work has been compiled with the sanction of the President and Council of the Royal Academy, and the compiler has had the advantage of consulting Lord Rosebery's collection of Royal Academy Catalogues, which contain all Horace Walpole's notes. The first volume runs from Abbeyne to Carrington. Every care has been taken to ensure accuracy and after each letter a number of blank pages are left for owners of the book to fill in in future years.

Messrs. Cassell have sent us a large quarto volume of Milton's Paradise Lost with the Doré illustrations, edited, with a Life of Milton and Notes, by Robert Vaughan, D.D. The inclusion of the Life is a good feature; but the literary introduction which follows appears to us quite out of place, and in a book which is produced primarily as a thing of beauty, and not for study by students, it seems to us that a foot-note, even so brief as those in this edition, spoils the look of the page without any compensating advantage. To explain that "Soldan" means Sultan, that "thralls" means slaves and that the bird of the nocturnal note is the nightingale, is to give us nothing in return for the unevenness which upsets the balance of an otherwise handsome page. The well-known illustrations are finely reproduced.

Messrs. Blackwood and Co., are bringing out in eight volumes (2s. 6d. each), a handy reprint of Burton's History of Scotland from Agricola's Invasion to the Extinction of the Last Jacobite Insurrection. Burton's History is universally acknowledged as at once the most learned, fair and interesting connected history of Scotland ever published. Modern research has necessarily invalidated a few of his conclusions, but the changes are such only as will affect specialists and do nothing to impair the great value of Burton's work.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"These anonymous letters are of conspicuous literary merit. Their style is charming, and they have a distinct flavour of that old-fashioned scholarship which strikes us so delightfully in some of our best eighteenth-century writers."

DAILY NEWS.—"Such charming letters... The author writes with that intimacy of self-revelation which is the secret of charm in correspondence."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"If any one supposes that the art of letter-writing is dead, this volume will prove the contrary... Altogether this is a curiously in-

THE LITERARY WEEK

THE Oxford undergraduate does not conform to Emerson's idea of a scholar. Instead of passing his time "in silence, in steadiness, in severe abstraction," he starts magazines, and expresses his opinion on all subjects under the sun. Sometimes his magazines do not last very long, as in the case of the Bull-dog, of which only one number was published. Sometimes they are quite durable and serious, like the well-known Oxford Magazine, established in 1865, and still flourishing, though not in the original formation. Here are reviews, sonnets, sermons—everything except the wit and reckless audacity of youth.

These last qualities, however, have adorned a good many of the Oxford periodicals. Among them one notes the Isis, which started with the laudable intention of not treating the Proctor as an enemy of the human race "but rather as one who from the exigencies of his position is constrained to make himself objectionable for a short space, but whose heart yearns for the day when he shall doff the garb of tyranny and be a man again"; the Oxford Spectator, written by Mr. T. H. Ward, E. Nolan, and the present Bishop of Calcutta; and the Shotover Papers, which strike a livelier note, and are not above including even Limericks.

Now there come to us two fresh magazines, the Protean and the Mosaic. They are of modest dimensions, and contain no remarks to alarm the Proctor or any other authority. Rather the tone is decorous and literary, as of one aiming at the ideal. The Protean, as its name indicates, welcomes to its pages the most varied topics. Here is a travel article, there an amusing account in verse of the way in which the "Meno" came to be written; there an attempt—not wholly successful—to do a thing more difficult than an ingenuous youth imagines—to put "La vie est brève" into English verse. The Mosaic bears on its first page a Greek word which signifies "the noise made by bubbles rising," but its contents, except perhaps for a short poem, are not of the bubble order. "Whistler as a Colourist" is a piece of elaborate and thoughtful art-criticism, and the other articles are remarkable for correct taste and high intellectual sympathies. These things are good; but are they the qualities most valuable in youth, the qualities that promise most bravely for originality and strength in maturer years? "Ragging," as we learn from the Protean, is dying out after bump-suppers and the like. Is literary ragging dying out too? Much as we admire the Mosaic, we cannot help an elderly sigh of regret for what we miss in its decorous pages.

The translation of "La vie est brève" is a favourite exercise of poets. The rendering of our Oxford poet in the Protean runs thus:

"La vie est brève, Un peu d'amour, Un peu de rêve, Et puis, bon jour !	"A few short years Of love and sorrow, Fancies and fears, And so—good-morrow !
"La vie est vaine; Un peu d'espoir, Un peu de haine, Et puis bon soir !"	"Vain empty life ! A little spell Of hope and strife, And then—farewell."

This hardly seems to us to catch the spirit of the original, and the French lines are not, we believe, correctly arranged. Should we not read:

"La vie est vaine— Un peu d'amour, Un peu de haine, Et puis bonjour.	"La vie est brève— Un peu d'espoir, Un peu de rêve, Et puis—bon soir."
---	---

About five hundred versions of this were published in the "Journal of Education" in 1900. One of the best of them was that by Mr. Francis Storr:

"Our life's a stage; A while we play At love and rage, And then—good day !	"Our life's a gleam, A swallow flight; We mope, we dream, And then—good-night."
---	--

This, by Miss Mary Grace Walker, has also much merit:

"This life is vain: Love's fleeting sway, Hate's passing pain, And then—good day !	"This life is brief: Hope's short delight, A dream's relief, And then—good-night."
---	---

We doubt, however, whether there is any rendering which is quite satisfactory at once by its grace and its close fidelity to the French.

In the Architectural Review for the current month is a well-informed and beautifully illustrated article by Mr. Champneys on "Irish Ecclesiastical Architecture," if such primitive and rude structures as those displayed can be classed as architecture. All the same, they transport us back to the dim past and call up the hermits of the sixth, seventh and eighth centuries, men not only of great saintliness, but of artistic feeling and learning remarkable for the times. Witness the Book of Kells, the glory of Trinity College, Dublin, and justly described "for taste and delicacy, originality and elaboration of colouring as among the wonders of the world." This volume was long preserved at the Monastery of Kells (founded by St. Columba), and was probably written there in the seventh century.

The early learning and zeal of the Irish monks is one of the surprises of history. Alcuin of York, "Minister of Education" to Charlemagne, wrote a letter to Colcu, chief professor of the school or University of Clonmacnoise, sending presents from himself and his master (Charlemagne) and requesting his prayers. Charlemagne, with the assistance of Alcuin, reformed and simplified the handwriting of the period based on Irish models; and Ireland became in the sixth, seventh and eighth centuries a centre of learning, and foreigners found their way to the Isle of Saints to learn Greek. In these rude cells, therefore, which are described by Mr. Champneys, dwelt men of real religion and learning. The history of the early Irish saints, their cells, their learning and their influence on Britain and Eastern Europe has yet to be written in monograph form. We have only to read Adamnan's "Life of Columba" which is now accessible to all, to realise the life and work of these ancient men of God. When we remember how much we are indebted to those forgotten men who lived for holiness and learning in their rough beehive-shaped structures with narrow entrances, our hearts warm to these seekers after light, who sought strangely according to modern ideas.

The old National Magazine from which last week we recovered a neglected "Imaginary Conversation" by Walter Savage Landor, has other matters of bibliographical interest hidden in its well-filled pages. Most lovers of the Lambs are aware that in the Cowden Clarkes' "Recollections of Writers," published in 1878, there are two pleasant chapters devoted to Charles and Mary Lamb, but none of the editors of Lamb's works seem aware of the fact that one of these chapters had made its original appearance twenty years earlier. It will be found, as "Recollections of Mary Lamb by One who knew Her," in the third volume of the magazine named (p. 360). In the second volume (p. 375) there will be found an early tale in prose by Christina G. Rossetti. It is entitled "Nick: a Child's Story," and tells how a curmudgeonly man who wished ill to his neighbours was suddenly endowed with the power of becoming what he wished for an hour at a time; after being a flock of sparrows, a bull-dog, a stick, fire, and an old miser, he is heartily glad to be restored to his old self and to forego wishing evil to other folk. Less notable writers—Dora Greenwell, Sydney Dobell, Wilkie Collins—will also be found represented in this interesting old periodical.

On Wednesday next (June 21) it will be just two hundred years since there was baptized at Cuddenden near Halifax, Yorkshire, an infant who was destined to be widely famous in the century to which he belonged. This was David Hartley, the actual date of whose birth is not known, and whose bi-centenary is little likely to cause much excitement, though a century ago he occupied a more important place in men's regard; indeed, it is little more than a century since Coleridge testified to his admiration for the natural philosopher by naming his eldest son after him. Educated as a physician—he practised latterly in the fashionable centres of London and Bath—it was as a natural philosopher (to use the old term) that he became most widely known, and his most notable book was entitled "Observations on Man, His Frame, His Duty and His Expectations." Boswell tells us with reference to Hartley that:

"Johnson one day observing a friend of his packing up two volumes of 'Observations on Man,' written by this great and good man, to take into the country, said, 'Sir, you do right to take Dr. Hartley with you; Priestley said of him that he had learned more from Hartley than from any book he had ever read except the Bible.'"

Sir Leslie Stephen, one of the leading authorities on eighteenth-century thought and literature, said that "Hartley's influence upon later English ethical writers of the empirical school was very great, and he anticipated most of their arguments in regard to association, a principle to which he gave a width of application previously unknown." Coleridge, in his "Religious Musings," calls him:

"Hartley, of mortal kind
Wisest, he first who marked the ideal tribes
Down the fine fibres from the sentient brain
Roll subtly singing."

Hartley died at the age of fifty-two, having gained a recognised position among the physicians and philosophers of his time, and being much liked for his pleasant genial manner. "Whoever carefully peruses his chief work," said Sir James Mackintosh, "must be unfortunate if he does not see, feel and own that the writer was a great philosopher and a good man."

The summer number of Country Life contains a hitherto unpublished poem by Robert Browning, the first fourteen lines of which, with the title, "A Forest Thought," and the poet's signature, with the date "Nov 4, 1837," are reproduced in facsimile. It is often said that Browning worked very hard upon his manuscripts, altering and correcting, polishing perhaps sometimes, but more often, unfortunately, plunging deeper into obscurity in the effort to get the whole of his thought into his lines. There is no trace of such effort and elaboration here. Browning, it appears from the note prefixed to the poem, had been with some friends to the christening of their son. On his return from the church to the house, he went into a room by himself, and after a very short absence returned with the poem, fifty-two lines in all, complete. The facsimile shows not a single correction. The fourteen lines are as unblotted as Shakespeare's.

And there is no occasion to wish it otherwise. The poet was seized with a simple thought, and simple and beautiful expression seems to have come to him without pause or difficulty. He is here the poet of "Oh! to be in England!" not of "Sordello" or the "Parleyings." He likens human birth and growth to that of the fir-trees "in far Esthonian solitudes." The parent-trees grow up and lose their youthful beauty:

"But just when beauty passes away
And you half regret it could not stay,
For all their sap and vigorous life—
Under the shade, secured from strife,
A seedling springs—the forest-tree
In miniature, and again we see
The delicate leaves that will fade one day,
The fan-like shoots that will drop away,
The taper-stem a breath could strain—
Which shall one day foil the hurricane:
We turn from this infant of the copse
To the parent-firs,—in their waving tops
To find some trace of the light-green tuft
A breath could stir,—in the bole aloft
Column-like set against the sky,
The spire that flourished floridly
And the marten bent as she rustled by."

Jane Welsh Carlyle would have no need to ask in this case, as she did in that of "Sordello," whether the subject of the poem was a man, a city, or a book. Browning's reputation would gain if some one would find more unprinted poems like this, and lose a good many of the printed ones.

We refuse to take Lord Rosebery seriously. Called upon at Edinburgh to make an after-dinner speech to the Associated Booksellers of Great Britain and Ireland he chose as his theme the relations of literature and commerce. The high-water mark of literature as a commercial undertaking was reached, he contended, in the first half of the nineteenth century. Poems were produced in quarto, and authors were paid in proportion to the size of the book. Without seeing "Lalla Rookh" Messrs. Longmans paid Moore a sum equivalent to-day to at least eight thousand pounds for the poem. That, said Lord Rosebery, was a time when publishers were too generous—when Southey was penning epics which he imagined would go down to posterity with Homer and Vergil. He wondered how many of the booksellers present had read "Lalla Rookh" or Southey's epics. Probably few. Poetry as a commercial article may have had its day; but Lord Rosebery cited isolated instances in support of his contention. And we question whether, taken as a whole, the prices realised by literary men in the early part of the nineteenth century would compare favourably with those obtained by our most popular novelists to-day.

The choice of the Academicians has fallen upon M. Étienne Lamy, a veteran author born in 1845. His best known works are "Études sur le second Empire," "La France du Levant," "L'armée et la démocratie," and "La femme de demain." His doctrines on the last-named subject may be illustrated by a quotation:

"If women do not sign many books, they prepare them by the thoughts which they communicate to their sons. The education of children—that is the great task, that is the permanent chef-d'œuvre of woman. When inquiring into a man's crimes we are accustomed to say: Cherchez la femme. When praising a man's virtues we should say: Cherchez la mère. The most pure, the most disinterested, the most profound tenderness cannot be barren of results. Into the thought and the heart of a child, a mother only allows that which is best of her to penetrate. For their children, the most egoistical forget themselves, the most frivolous become grave, the least virtuous are sanctified."

M. Maurice Barrès, who had fourteen votes at the election, is a much younger man. Born in 1862, he began to write while still a student at Nancy. In 1882 he contributed to La Jeune France an article entitled "Le théâtre d'Auguste Vacquerie," and was complimented in the Answers to Correspondents. "You have much wit, and you are very charming," he read; and the compliment was the more valuable because La Jeune France was in the habit of insulting its correspondents in this way: "Impossible. Not worth a row of pins." Or again: "To X. at Paris: The man who edits the Bulletin bibliographique certainly does not pretend to have your genius. He is satisfied not to be a fool. You would be wise to follow his example, though to do that is beyond some people's power."

It is thought likely that M. Barrès may win his seat at the next election, necessitated by the death of the Duc d'Audiffret-Pasquier; but if, as reported to be likely, M. Ribot—the orator, not the psychologist—stands against him, the competition will be formidable. The vacancy is not, however, to be filled until the autumn, and between now and then many things may happen.

Two disputes are at present raging around literary monuments. The Stendhal Committee, having money to spend, cannot agree whether to spend it on a bust or on bringing out a new edition of the Correspondence, which is out of print.

The other dispute, more acute in character, concerns a proposal for a monument to Lamartine. A paper called Les Annales romantiques, has started a subscription for the erection of a memorial to the poet and his mistress, "Elvire," on the shores of the Lac de Bourget, where they lived and loved and boated some eighty or ninety years ago. We told their story in these columns, not very long since. Elvire, it will be remembered, was a married woman who repented of her affection before she died, while her lover, after mourning his loss, married another lady. In the circumstances, is it a correct taste which proposes to affix the medallion of the one lover to the statue of the other? There are, at all events, French critics who hold that the precedent is a bad one. "You might as well," protests one of them, "build a monument to unite in posthumous reconciliation such lovers as George Sand and Alfred de Musset."

Another literary topic of which the French papers are full is what is called "the incident Paul Chenay." Long years ago, at the time when Victor Hugo was in exile in Guernsey, M. Chenay, by profession an artist and engraver, met Madame Hugo at the house of Deplhine Gay, and married her younger sister. Invited to Hauteville House, he remained there for four years, and some time after his return wrote a book on the poet's domestic affairs, which led to a breach with the members of the poet's family. Hugo's domestic affairs were such that it was impossible to write of them truthfully without giving offence; but, of course, his brother-in-law, having enjoyed his hospitality, should have held his peace. The "incident" arises because M. Chenay in his old age—he is eighty-seven—finds himself reduced to absolute poverty, living with his daughter in a single room, without the means to pay the rent for it, while the rest of the Hugo family is prosperous. Hence an interview with M. Paul Meurice, Victor Hugo's executor, and inquiries as to what the family propose to do.

"In such difficult situations," says M. Meurice, "in which our interests or our rancours conflict with our desire to pity and forgive, I always ask myself what Victor Hugo would have done in my place. In this case he would have pitied, he would have forgiven. We know it from his own writings: 'Donne-lui tout de même à boire, dit mon père.' I am, therefore, exerting all my eloquence to procure him [M. Chenay] a small monthly allowance, and I am also seeing what I can do for his daughter. Claretie has promised me that she shall have the first vacant place as 'ouvreuse.' Which sounds perhaps more generous than it is, for there is really something tragic in the thought that when we go to see Hugo's plays at the Français our hats and coats should be taken by his niece.

Mr. Werner Laurie will publish during June a work by Mr. James Huneker, the well-known critic. It is to be called "Iconoclasts: A Book of Dramatists," and is the result of a study of the theatre in many capitals. The volume comprises critical studies of Henrik Ibsen, August Strindberg, Henry Becque, Gerhart Hauptmann, Paul Hervieu, The Quintessence of Shaw, Maxim Gorky's Nachtasyl, Hermann Sudermann, Princess Mathilde's Play, Duse and D'Annunzio, Villiers de l'Isle Adam, and Maurice Maeterlinck.

LITERATURE

THE INCONVENIENCE OF FAME

Essays of Travel. By R. L. STEVENSON. Recollections of R. L. Stevenson in the Pacific. By ARTHUR JOHNSTONE. (Chatto & Windus, 6s. each.)

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON is suffering the ill-fortune which is inseparable from a too sudden fame. In the first place, the casual articles which he wrote in his youth, and which he did not deem it worth while to collect between two covers, are reprinted as though they were masterpieces. In the second, curious enthusiasts gather his trivial sayings, and note the most commonplace habits of his life. No good end is served by either of these enterprises, and while we deplore the injury done to the victim, we cannot too strongly condemn the indiscretion of anxious editors and impertinent biographers.

Stevenson's "Essays of Travel" have already found a place in the complete edition of his works. There they might very well have remained for the pleasure of those who wish to lose no single line of his writing. But they add nothing to his reputation. They are merely worse specimens of what he has done far better elsewhere. Of course, they are written with a careful elaboration, or they would not be his. Of course, also, they contain ingenious fancies and sincere impressions. But we read them all without enthusiasm, and some of them even without interest. The one point worthy of notice in the book is that Stevenson set out in his youth upon the self-same path which he followed to the end. As early as 1871 he was conscious of his style, and though he had not so much to say as in later years, he was already sternly scrupulous in the use of words.

But, while small service is done to his memory by the republication of these essays, a far greater wrong is inflicted by the inconsiderate recollections of Paul I'rys.

There is no single word, for instance, that can be said in favour of Mr. Arthur Johnstone's prolix and pretentious work. Mr. Johnstone is as deficient in taste as in knowledge of letters. It is evident that he holds strong views concerning the politics of the Islands, and as he differs completely in his opinion from Stevenson, he might have written an interesting article upon the crisis in Samoa, and the misgovernment of the Sandwich Islands. But so modest a plan would never satisfy him. He must collect whatever unimportant facts he can concerning the great man, and he must give us his opinion, which is not worth a great deal, of the great man's works. His industry, had it been used in a better cause, would be entitled to the highest praise. He seems to have cross-examined everybody who encountered Stevenson in Polynesia. He inflicts upon us with minute detail the observations which the Captain of the Casco has thought fit to make upon the novelist. He has reproduced in facsimile a trivial letter which Stevenson addressed to the editor of the Honolulu Advertiser. He has printed at length a speech which Stevenson delivered to the Scottish Thistle Club, and which contains nothing that need be remembered. But the most remarkable trait in the character of Mr. Johnstone and his friends is that they one and all regarded Robert Louis Stevenson as a kind of freak; they looked at him with the same foolish curiosity wherewith children gaze at wild beasts in a show. If the novelist did any of the common things which life imposes upon mankind, they affected a wild surprise. We have no doubt that if he doffed his hat in their presence they went into an ecstasy of wonder, and from the tone of Mr. Johnstone's book we may conclude that their astonishment could not have been greater had their hero entered the room on his head. When Mr. Johnstone piously describes Stevenson's appearance before the Scottish Thistle Club he informs us that the novelist "threw off several heavy wraps before entering the hall." Would he have had him keep them about him, and catch cold on his homeward journey? And as if this were not sufficiently amazing, he proceeds to tell us that Stevenson "walked directly to the platform." How should he walk? Should he have proceeded sideways like a crab, or should he have fluttered round and round like a frightened bird in a strenuous effort to find the spot? But they are all inspired with the same folly—these amiable Polynesians. The innkeeper at Honolulu, whose reminiscences Mr. Johnstone has been lucky enough to print, is evidently a plain and honest soul. "During his sojourn," says he, "Stevenson lived simply and without demonstration." We should like to know what demonstration the innkeeper expected Stevenson to make? Maybe, he hoped that a brass band would always be playing beneath his window; maybe he hoped for the good of the house that Stevenson would spend his leisure in addressing the populace from a first-floor window; but he was disappointed, for he has put it on record that Stevenson lived "without demonstration." And this is not the worst. "He generally went to bed early," continues the observant innkeeper, "but not always; yet he was always early awake, although it was his habit to breakfast in bed, arising for the day at nine or sometimes ten o'clock." Fancy that! Then we have it on the same unimpeachable authority that at dinner Stevenson drank a light red wine, called California Burgundy, and that he enjoyed daily a cup of black coffee with burnt brandy. Who is there interested in English literature who will not be thrilled by these incontrovertible statements? If the innkeeper did not know what Stevenson drank, who on earth should? At the same time, though we cannot sufficiently praise the care with which the excellent innkeeper noted the tastes and habits of his client, there is a certain inconvenience in the innkeeper's volubility. Were his habit to become universal, a new terror would be added to life. All travellers are not content with California Burgundy and burnt brandy. Some might attempt to rival the prowess of King Kalakaua, who, as is duly recorded in this eminent work, drank five bottles of champagne and the best part of two bottles of brandy at a sitting, when he visited Stevenson's yacht.

Mr. Johnstone is so profoundly interested in the small details of life, that we should not suspect him of literary criticism. But evidently he is a many-sided man, to whom nothing comes amiss. So, not content with recording the favourite drinks of Stevenson and King Kalakaua, he tells us with a dogmatic severity what we ought to think of Stevenson's works. His own method of writing does not suggest an accurate knowledge of the English language. But his courage is evidently greater than his understanding. His masterpiece is certainly an appreciation of the famous letter to Dr. Hyde, and so fine is it that we must quote it word by word:

"Stevenson's effort," writes the Hawaiian critic, "will be found to include all the scorn and invective of Archilochus, the permeating ethic element of Simonides of Amorgus; the rhetorical finish of Juvenal together with several of the minor excellences drawn from the Greek and Roman authors."

Obviously they are fine scholars in Honolulu. There they can discuss the scorn and invective of Archilochus, a satirist whose works have hitherto escaped the notice of European scholars; they can note the permeating ethic element of a poet who unfortunately is no more than a name to the old world. Nor is the scholarship of Honolulu confined to the classics.

"If modern writers are considered," says the intrepid Mr. Johnstone, "it will be seen that, while he wrote the letter with the haste and disingenuousness of Erasmus, it contains as well the pungency of Byron's invective, together with the sharp, incisive thrusting of Carlyle."

This is the last word of Hawaiian criticism. Mr. Johnstone may write for fifty years; but never again will he happen upon such a pearl of speech as the "haste and disingenuousness of Erasmus." After this gem of lucidity we can only regard English scholarship as a "back number," and we look forward to the time when Mr. Johnstone, having learnt how not to split his infinitives, will send us across the seas a new life of Erasmus, or a complete edition, with emendations, of the works of Simonides of Amorgus.

From what we have said it will be clear to the most superficial reader that Mr. Johnstone is well equipped for the discussion of Stevenson's style. With exquisite moderation, he confesses that Stevenson did not "introduce the art of good writing." But, if he did not introduce it, he "pruned the art," and invented a set of rules which can be "practically followed in all classes of composition." Though Mr. Johnstone does not think much of Stevenson's predecessors, he confesses with admirable generosity that Dickens and Thackeray "partially" knew how to write English. This is a splendid concession: "partially" is excellent; and we only regret that we cannot pay Mr. Johnstone the same compliment which he in his magnanimity has paid to the poor benighted writers of the nineteenth century. We regret it the more because Mr. Johnstone has studied Stevenson's system, which, we are assured "will produce the best literary results in exact proportion to the mental endowments of the writer." Dare we conclude that the mental endowments of Mr. Johnstone, this valiant student of Archilochus and Simonides of Amorgus, are not what they might be? There is evidently a hitch somewhere, and we leave it to our readers to discover precisely where it is.

PROFESSOR RALEIGH ON HAKLUYT

The Principal Navigations Voyages Traffiques and Discoveries of the English Nation. By RICHARD HAKLUYT. Vol. XII. (Glasgow, MacLehose, 12s. 6d. net.)

THIS twelfth and last volume has just been issued, after a delay, occasioned, as the publishers' note informs us, by the great labour involved in the preparation of the index. The value of the index is, however, more than a compensation for the delay. Together with the index, Professor Raleigh's admirable essay constitutes the last volume of a very notable enterprise.

In Professor Raleigh's phrase, the Hakluyt collection makes the preface to the British Empire, which is the inheritance of to-day. If we would rightly comprehend the meaning of empire, we must begin by studying the preface, the title-deeds of our inheritance. And here, at first sight, is matter for astonishment, in that we have been content to wait from Hakluyt's time until now—save for "a single later reprint, numbering three hundred and twenty-five copies"—for a work of such essential and intimate moment in the history of the nation. But, this apparent indifference is a national characteristic. The Englishman is ever more interested in what is next to do than in what has been done. And his attitude is still both sane and natural; for, as Professor Raleigh pertinently writes:

"Fame is a luxury, if not a vanity. By secret and unconscious methods of initiation, by that unwritten tradition which descends from father to son, by the law of nature which gives currency to inherent value no matter whose the superscription, the ideas and aims of the great Elizabethan seamen have become the creed of the British Empire."

Here is a truth which men of letters, whose vocation holds them much apart, are slow to recognise. Because they themselves own the gift which is the portion of the few, the power of passing at will into another life and dwelling in books, they forget that the many which have it not must swim as best they may in the troubled current of affairs. But, even so, the lovers and the makers of literature have their reward. They show the way, after all. For, what was it that inspired the old voyagers to adventure? What was the irresistible lure, the charm that first drew them to attempt unknown and perilous seas, to affront unimaginable hardships and labours, and to achieve the impossible?

"The poets," says Professor Raleigh, "are the true fathers of later science. So early as the sixth century the monk Cosmas, in his 'Universal Christian Topography,' states the object of many a later quest. 'If Paradise,' he says, 'were really on the surface of this world, is there not many a man among those who are so keen to learn and search out everything, that would not let himself be deterred from reaching it? When we see that there are men who will not be deterred from penetrating to the ends of the earth in search of silk, and all for the sake of filthy lucre, how can we believe that they would be deterred from going to get a sight of Paradise?' All through the Middle Ages the dream held sway . . ."

It came true at last, though in another sense than the dreamers' anticipation. The Eternal City was never attained; and now that the whole earth is parcelled out among the nations, they are still seeking the City by another way. The old voyagers thought to find it ready built, in a fair land ripe for habitation. We have learned at last that ourselves must subdue the land, and that our own hands must build the City.

The quest for an earthly paradise, however, made but a part of the enterprise. For, interfused with the spiritual motive, were the desire of the unknown, the ambition of great achievement, and the lust of gold. And at the price of many lives and of much suffering, by means of infinite daring and resource and fortitude, were these ends attained. The tangible result is what we call, somewhat vaguely, the British Empire. But the intangible result is a greater thing than vast demesnes and the lordship of the sea. It lies deep in the foundations of the British character.

"In this partial and naked record," says Professor Raleigh, "preserved for us by Hakluyt, are inscribed the deeds which for half a century excited wild emotions, kindled emulation in the young, provided strange food for the intellect, and gave strength and purpose to the activities of a nation."

The avatar of that spirit brought us, not only to great possessions and wide power but to things greater, perhaps, than these. It was the spirit of the age that gave us the Elizabethan literature. Empires may fall, and power may dwindle away; but the written word endures. And in the possession of that literature there lies, perhaps, the reason why the Voyages themselves have been so long neglected by men of letters as well as by men of action. Enjoying the harvest, they thought not of the stern travail of the ploughing; nor were they, it seems, even sensible of the cause that produced the effect. It is not, indeed, too much to say that we owe to Professor Raleigh the perception of the relation of the Voyages to literature; although, it is true, it was pointed out, years ago, by W. E. Henley.

For, as the words of the maker, the poet, first moved the men of action, so the achievements of the adventurer inspired in their turn the builders of a great literature. Here is what we are apt to ignore. We are prone to regard the provinces of life as straitly divided one from another. But life is woven of too close a texture and of a pattern too intricate to accord with such a convention; and to parcel it into squares is to lose the design of the whole. Indeed, no part of Professor Raleigh's essay is more subtly instructive than those passages in which he traces the relation of the deeds of the voyagers to the literature of their time.

"The new ferment wrought in a deep and hidden fashion in the temper and habits of the mind. All preconceived notions and beliefs concerning cosmography, history, politics and society were made ridiculous by the new discoveries. . . . That marvellous summer-time of the imagination, the Elizabethan age, with all its wealth of flowers and fruit, was the gift to England of the sun that bronzed the faces of the voyagers and of the winds that carried them to the four quarters of the world."

And here, Professor Raleigh deals with two questions which naturally arise, and which ever beset the student, treating them with a delicacy of discrimination and a range of knowledge which are all his own. The one question has to do with the choice of material; the other with the old discord between classic and romantic. To the student of his art, seeking the perfect way, it is natural to inquire of the great masters the secret of their practice. It is incommunicable—but the inquiry is not without profit. And where shall greater profit be gathered than from the makers of the golden age?

With regard to the choice of material, Professor Raleigh observes that:

"Charles Lamb, who loved all that is familiar and ancient and homely, somewhere expresses regret that the plays of Shakespeare and some of his brother dramatists hardly ever choose as their theme the simple daily life of the England of their time."

But, "had the dramatists been of his mind, we should have had no great English drama, and no Shakespeare." For,

"action and imagination went hand in hand. If the voyagers explored new countries and trafficked with strange peoples, the poets and dramatists went abroad too, and rifled foreign nations, returning with far-fetched and dear-bought wares; or explored lonely and untried recesses of the microcosm of man. One spirit of discovery and exultant power animated both seamen and poets. Shakespeare and Marlowe were, no less than Drake and Cavendish, circumnavigators of the world."

It is, in fact, the spirit that is the essential; the spirit that informs the treatment of the material, rather than the material itself. And still we are to remark that the poet does use the life that is nearest to him. Professor Raleigh continues:

"Shakespeare, it is often said, tells us more of Italy than of England; yet in Shakespeare's plays only the labels are Italian, while every type of English character, from a king to a tinker, is drawn to the life. . . . It is true that the names of the great men of his time seldom occur in his plays. . . . A poet commonly prefers to work with human material closer at hand, easier to come at, not hedged around by popular favour or on its guard against intimate research. He will select at his own liking from the life around him, build up his own greatness, and borrow a name from ancient history or fable. But whatever is most characteristic and vital in the life and thought of an age will find utterance in its poetry, none the less."

It is justly said; and not less just are Professor Raleigh's observations upon the perennial controversy between classic and romantic. Here again, the right appreciation is to be attained rather by the estimation of the spirit that inspires the treatment of material, than from the treatment itself. For the point at issue inevitably narrows to a question of treatment. The material is the same in all ages; it is the stuff which Mr. Meredith calls "internal history."

"It is true," says Professor Raleigh, "that France, by position, history and training, was from the first more under the influence of classic literature and ancient theory than ever England had been. But in England, too, when the drama began its course, the partisans of the classical doctrine were first in the field, and made the bravest start. Then the new interest arose, and overwhelmed them. The echoes of ancient wisdom and shadows of ancient beauty which held the attention of France were drowned and scattered in England by loud voices and fierce lights. Extravagant deeds filled the popular imagination, and could not, by any legerdemain of pedantry, be brought within the prescribed critical compass. If the dramatists refused allegiance to the rules, they were merely following the lead of the adventurers."

Such a passage, which is quoted in full because it is impossible to phrase the matter more tersely and vividly, is itself an exemplar of a high degree of critical acumen. For the business of the critic is to appreciate, to rate a thing at its just value. In order to achieve his end, the critic must first understand the moving spirit. He must perceive and know the working of the human impulse; and when he has done that, he has done all. He has tracked the essence of the thing to its hidden source, so that he who reads may understand. And to attain understanding is the business of the student of letters. Hence it is that the perusal of the Voyages were best begun with Professor Raleigh's essay in the twelfth volume. For the object and reward of such a perusal—apart from the pleasure to be gained from the stories themselves, set down in their sound, homely Elizabethan English—are surely the getting of a better understanding, not only of this England and empire of ours but, of the noble literature which is our inalienable possession.

THE ROMANCE OF THE JUNGLE

Rifle and Romance in the Indian Jungle. By Captain A. I. R. GLASFURD. (Lane, 16s. net.)

THE public has within the last score of years had thrust upon it so many books concerning big-game shooting, a considerable percentage of them written by men who are distinctly better at handling the rifle than the pen, that it is apt to look somewhat askance at volumes of this kind. But a perusal of Captain Glasfurd's book convinces us that here is a work which will be received with pleasure by many classes of readers. It appeals to a far wider public than that to which sporting literature is usually addressed. In certain respects it is, indeed, somewhat of a new departure, and its author, who is a writer much above the average of his kind—the shikári kind—has succeeded in preparing a most cunning and admirable blend of fact, romance, weird mystery and sound advice. He is clearly a man who thoroughly understands his subject. He has entered heart and soul into the long and wonderful history of the jungle and its secrets, and he has succeeded in setting forth for the reader's behoof some of the most charming sketches of wild life and a wild country that we have ever had the good fortune to meet.

No man, who had not penetrated to the very heart of his subject, could have written the "Biography of a Tiger," a chapter in jungle life which relates with astonishing fidelity the life-history of this royal beast. We are not quite sure whether the finish of the tiger's long and bloody career is quite the artistic ending to this fascinating chapter. The narrative in "Told by the Doctor" imparts an eerie touch of the supernatural. Whether or not this is meant to be accepted as actual experience we are uncertain. Still, India is full of mystery and Mr. Rudyard Kipling has by this time accustomed us to the true Oriental mingling of crude matter-of-fact with uncanny happenings.

In the strange and wonderful tale of "The Vengeance of Jhápoo the Gónd," Captain Glasfurd has, by the way, given us a hunting yarn quite in the manner of Mr. Kipling himself. This strange story of the Gónd hunter, who possessed the mystic secret of attracting tigers in his own lifetime, and whose mummified remains were, after his death, utilised for the same purpose, is quite one of the best combinations of mystery and wild life that we have read for a long time. It has the right romantic flavour and is likely to linger in the memory.

But the book is by no means composed only of matter of this kind. The author, quitting the realms of mystery and imagination, conducts us at other times into the plainer paths of straightforward fact. He has the knack of making his narrative at all times interesting, and his accounts of sport with sambar, sloth bear, boar, leopard, blackbuck, buffalo and so forth are very well done. He is manifestly a keen naturakst, learned in the ways and habits of the game about which he discourses. His sketches of the life histories of that fine deer the sambar, and of the blackbuck are, in their way, as excellent as that of the tiger. In "Melursus diabolicus," he tells of an adventure of his own with a sloth bear, in which his escape from death must have been truly marvellous. The sloth bear is, in effect, by no means the harmless and inoffensive beast imagined even by many sportsmen, and Captain Glasfurd's wounds and his miraculous escape from the dangers of a yawning precipice testify to the seriousness of an encounter with one of these despised animals.

Search where one will through this entertaining book, one happens always upon sound literature, fine descriptions, good natural history and lively adventure. The author is clearly in love with his subject, and his pictures of jungle scenery and jungle life are wonderfully vivid. We have read few books on India in which the scenes described have been so well conveyed to the mind's eye of the reader. "The Man Eater of Bélkhéra," "By Tamarind and Mhowa," "Reminiscences of Junglypur," and "Panther-Fishing in Mung-Bung," are all in their way excellent. The reader should by no means neglect in the appendix the "Letters of Jhoot Singh," process-server, táhsil chaprasi and sometime shikári, which give one an extraordinarily good idea of the native mind in connection with Indian sport.

Finally in "Round the Camp Fire," the author has not neglected to give his views on the position and future of Indian shooting—views which are well worth the attention of all those interested in this subject. His idea of a battery is: for ponderous game the medium bore cordite rifle; for dangerous soft-skinned game (tiger and leopard for example), at close ranges, the ball and shot-gun of the Paradox type, not smaller than 12-bore; and for long sporting range shooting at harmless game, on hill or plain, the 303.

Upon the whole we are inclined to consider this volume as one of the best on Indian wild life that have appeared for the last forty years. Its blending of romance and reality, far from destroying its verisimilitude, renders it additionally fascinating. Well illustrated and well got up, it is in all respects a first-rate book.

NEITHER BOOK NOR GUIDE-BOOK

A Book of South Wales. By S. BARING-GOULD. With fifty-seven Illustrations. (Methuen, 6s.)

THERE is no doubt about Mr. Baring-Gould's talent, or about the willingness of the public to buy books of this kind; yet our wonder is now revived for the hundredth time, as to what such books mean; what they are designed to express; why they are read. They are like guides in every way, except that they do not guide, and to us, at least, they seem to be inferior to their much earlier predecessors, in spite of the fact that in size, brevity and accuracy they are superior. A hundred years ago, fifty years ago, if a man wrote a book about Wales, he was a learned man, or he had crossed a mountain which no other writing Englishman had crossed, or he had enjoyed himself immensely there, and in any case, thought that the world ought to know it. So he put down a few fairy tales, a few legends, a few scraps of history, added many descriptions of scenery and of his own delight, and made a book which is unreadable to-day. Yet at least the motive of his book was clear. The result was truly a book. He would describe his route with care, mentioning the state of the roads and inns, and places that commanded good views; and thus the book had character; it was a man's impression; it was companionable in its time, and useful, we dare say.

A volume like the one before us is hardly a book. Let us admit at once that it is packed with information. There is history; there are fairy tales, adventures; many pages reveal to a discerning reader the people and the places; the photographs are many and good. But it is not one's man impression, it is a hundred confused and partial impressions. There is no plan; it does not even follow the course of a walking tour; it might be supposed that there are no roads in Wales, if Mr. Baring-Gould were our only source of information. Nor is there any unity of spirit. We dimly believe that the author wishes to give us information; we do not know why, and we see that he does not like it. Such a book could be valuable only if it were complete; if it told us all that every one knew, or what several representative men knew. It does not do that, perhaps from lack of space. Sometimes, the author transcribes history at great length; he digresses; he gives, e.g., half a dozen instances, from many lands, of dancing in holy places, because he has mentioned that they used to dance in the churchyards of Radnor; but clearly he does it because these facts have been easily accessible, not because he revels in them and can express himself thereby. Therefore, he is often flat. But while he expands often, he often clips. He will spoil a legend, e.g., the legend of the shepherd and the maiden of Llyn y fan fach, in order to cut it short; he will omit the finishing touch of a story, as he does in copying Gerald's story of Elidorus and the little people; he vulgarises others. Now and then he feels that his faculty of giving mere information is running away with him, and he stops short; then his transitions are wonderful. He completes nothing; he suggests nothing. He wastes time in calling Geoffrey "that supreme prince of liars," which is absurd, and then sets down a number of valueless possibilities and denials, infinitely less useful than Geoffrey's exuberances. He transcribes almost word for word some of Elijah Waring's pictures of Iolo Morganwg, without acknowledgment. And all this because he has no motive. Hence also his style is bad. It is sometimes inaccurate, often inconsequent; its short sentences are suddenly printed as paragraphs, for no reason; it is capable of this, too:

"It may be said of every man, that at one moment in his life luck holds the golden plum above his lips. But it is not every man who snaps and secures it." . . .

Briefly, the book is typical of its kind to-day, and its chief merit is that it is made, probably not out of malice aforethought, to supply exactly the needs of idle tourists seeking useless information.

THE CITY OF ETERNAL CONTRADICTIONS

Rome. Painted by A. PISA. Text by M. A. R. TUKER and HOPE MALLESON. (A. & C. Black, 20s. net.)

THE publishers have brought to the production of this book spacious qualities—good print, generous treatment of the page, liberal use of pictures, admirable colour-printing. The paintings by A. Pisa are dainty and charming. True, they have nothing of the grand manner; his Rome is bereft of grandeur and of the impression of her mighty splendour, haunted by not even the ghost of her departed magnificence. But it is good to meet with an artist who will see Rome for himself and paint her as he sees her, even though there be some little discrepancy between text and illustrations. Even so, this book is one of the best in all this fine series, for they that have wrought the written picture of Rome within it have trailed something of that ancient magnificence across these pages; nay, have done a more perfect work than that—they have stated the Rome of to-day, her life, her soul, her true inward meaning, her virtues and her vices, with a clearness that will make the book a necessity to all who would embark on the journey to the wondrous city out of whose lap were born two of the mightiest civilisations of the past—that Rome that was conceived from those two hills by yellow Tiber whereon shepherd clans had their wattled homes, coming down into the valley that divided them to fight out their rivalries and their feuds—that Rome that, incapable of mysticism as of philosophy, used her practical bent to build up the world this side of the grave into one of the most splendid of Empires; to build up the hint of the world beyond the grave into one of the most splendid of churches. Rome, that has bred a people who live in the street, not in their comfortless, squalid homes—a splendid city that is infested by aggressive beggars—a lawless city where the brigand until recently flung his hat in the road and begged alms for the love of God, his blunderbuss at your head to bring charity to birth. Rome that has been pulled down and into waste-heaps by almost every generation of her sons, and rebuilt out of her splendid fragments, and torn down again and builded again—whose senseless blood-feuds were fought with the flinging of missiles torn from her majestic and beautiful sculptures, so rich was she in works of priceless art. Rome, where the peasant's dog-hole and the rich man's palace alike have been built of the marble fragments filched from the homes of the Cæsars. Goth and Vandal, emperor and mob, pope and cardinal, all have pillaged her—she, the magnificent, who aforetime had the greatest baths in the world, where now the Roman has forgotten how to wash. Religious processions make her streets to swarm; and her every tradesman is a born cheat, every soul a lover of the pageant of life, every servant a rebel against the washing of a floor; where every man loves his blood-kin, none knows friendship. Rome that breeds the most amiable well-bred people in the western world, a people too proud to work, never too proud to beg—a people that taught their daughters to read that they might satisfy the Roman itch of curiosity, forbade them to write lest they should pen the love-letter! Rome that stabs with the stealthily drawn sudden steel to settle the most insignificant quarrel—where the death-blow, struck in the public square in open daylight is carefully unseen by all that stand round about—wanton, childish, hot-blooded Rome, that is incapable of understanding the word Justice. A holy city where cruelty to animals that sickens the heart to see merely arouses a shrug or smile even in her priests—a city where crime is blackest in all Europe. Holy Rome in whose streets no woman may walk alone and unmolested. Rome, which is the very treasure-house of the arts, and the home of the most in-artistic of people. A city of Romance that has two smells, one by day and one by night, that no man shall ever forget. The eternal city—of eternal contradictions.

TRAVELLERS' TALES .

Études critiques sur la vie de Colomb avant ses découvertes. By HENRY VIGNAUD. (Paris: H. Welter.)

THE traveller's right to romance is of great antiquity and one of the most widely respected of privileges. Columbus made free use of this right, though to what extent posterity will probably never know. M. Vignaud's book is an elaborate series of studies on some of the more doubtful points in the early career of Columbus, and concludes with the terse statement that "Colomb n'était pas un homme véridique, voilà la seule conclusion qu'il convient de poser pour le moment." It is to be hoped that M. Vignaud may find it convenient at some future date to continue his investigations, for although the points raised in his volume are historically trivial, their bearing is of far greater importance.

Columbus, according to M. Vignaud, was not, as he pretended to be, one of a family of navigators, nor was he, as his son maintained, of a noble family: he was, as were his parents and all his kin, a weaver. His son and Las Casas have perpetuated the statement that there were two admirals in the family, which is false. The much-disputed year of his birth is now said to be 1451 and not 1435 nor any of the other dates given; he was not educated at Pavia; he did not go to sea at the age of fourteen; he did not explore as far as Iceland; he was not a truthful man: these are a few of the results of M. Vignaud's labours. In broader terms, it may be said that not one of the facts related by his son and by Las Casas about the youth of Columbus can be accepted as proved, and they were facts related by Columbus himself and not merely rumours. It is easy to say that these inventions were the outcome rather of vanity than of duplicity, and that, when all is said and done, they are of no importance inasmuch as they do not detract from the greatness of Columbus' work. The insight into the explorer's character, however, has a deeper interest. Is the old legend that Columbus sought for a western route to the Indies doomed to be laid bare as fiction? If so, we must set about finding a new theory of the origin and character of the enterprise which resulted in the discovery of the New World. The theory based on the assertions of so untruthful a man as Columbus, and of the early writers to whom he dictated his fictions, must be scrutinised as carefully as have been the facts of his youth. The fictitious events of his early life may well have been invented to fit in with his "western passage" theory: hence we find Columbus as a sailor by profession, admirals in the family tree, university education, campaigns in war, long expeditions to the uttermost parts of the earth—an excellent training for the future discoverer of America. But if we grant the truth of M. Vignaud's profound study on the subject, we can only wonder what led Columbus across the sea: there is, on the face of it, no reason for believing Columbus himself.

Some champion may possibly arise. Sir Clements Markham might take up the cudgels, or Mr. Andrew Lang might touch upon the subject, but whatever may happen, M. Vignaud has made a most determined attack on tradition. Possibly the best thing to do now would be to write a book to show that Columbus never lived: a greater than he experienced this honour, and his memory still thrives.

A CHRONICLE OF PERUGIA

Chronicles of the City of Perugia: 1492-1503. Written by FRANCESCO MATARAZZO. Translated by EDWARD STRACHAN MORGAN. (Dent, 5s.)

A HISTORY at first hand is always welcome, and a scholar's view of active warfare can hardly fail to be instructive. Few writers have been better equipped for romantic storytelling than Francesco Matarazzo, who spent practically the whole of his life studying at close quarters the personal struggles which made the times in which he lived so picturesque. His eye ranged over the whole of Italy, whilst his home-loving mind, addicted to peaceful learning, dwelt with sorrowful satisfaction upon the Perugia which ambition and the lust of men had made desolate. Happily he found it worth a song. Indeed, his chronicle has some of the qualities of an epic, and might be offered with confidence to any good poet in search of a theme. Though it begins with lamentation and woe, it surges along to an accompaniment of all the manly virtues; noble deeds are accomplished at every turn, if often for very ignoble ends. Matarazzo is not one of those writers who can record facts of horror without a shudder, and he never takes pains to extenuate the violent actions even of his heroes and patrons, the Baglioni. On the other hand, we cannot help wishing that we might hear a little more of the chronicler himself, a little more of the part his undoubtedly prudent deeds must have played in the turbulent age so vividly realised by his writings. To the day of his death he was held in honour at Perugia, and he died at the age of seventy-five. The highest offices were filled by him both in the University and in the State. Though for a few years he taught elsewhere, it was to Perugia that he looked at the end for everything that made life worth living; and he paid the debt with interest. "As we turn over his pages the life of Perugia palpitates before us."

And what a life! The whole method of existence in these grand mediæval towns, especially of Italy, presents a fiscal problem big with interest. How could the fabric of society ever hold together in the face of such extravagance? So-called States, which possessed no commercial resources, vied with one another in devising suitable entertainment for distinguished guests. They indulged in aldermanic splendour without its vulgarity. Their very soldiering was half love of show. And since to build finely was an obvious public duty, the life of the commonwealth had to be adjusted on a scale commensurate with dignity visible at every turn. When a mere professor—and such for the greater part of his life was Matarazzo—could succeed in obtaining for his stipend the taxes of two villages, it is easy to understand what misery was inflicted in order to secure the glory of the Baglioni. And yet that "High and Mighty Family" condoned for its misdeeds which were typical of the age, by courage, nobility, liberal-mindedness, and many other virtues. Though they spent too freely, they spent largely on beauty; though they made haste to shed blood, it was in the cause of what they held to be honour and justice that their own lives were lavishly given. And the same must be said of their rivals.

Matarazzo's Chronicle is, indeed, chiefly an affair of excursions and alarums. For several centuries the riotous enterprises of the Baglioni and Oddi factions made history for Perugia, and it was in Matarazzo's own time that the most exciting episodes culminated. Braccio Fortebraccio the greatest of all Perugians, had fallen in battle some twenty years before the historian's birth. After Braccio's day, the dream of a central kingdom, which should equal the mightier Italian States, was shattered, but a theory was still left to be fought for, and the struggles which followed make lively reading, right down to the time when the Baglioni fell, to rise no more.

Saints and sinners jostle one another in this ancient world of wild passions and mettlesome encounters, with a pride in their own virtue or vice such as this milder age would strive in vain to copy. Miracles were common in old Perugia. Saint Colomba might be deluded; so thought the brothers of Saint Francis; but facts are facts, and the secular arm was raised in her defence, the city's purse was placed at her disposal. Such deeds speak louder than mere legends. "Believe or not as you please," says the chronicler. For he has many more marvellous things to relate. There is the story of the death of Altobello, for instance, a marauder who met with his due.

"And proclamation was made for Altobello. At the last he was found. . . . Then they who had taken him would have kept him alive and brought him to show to their captain. . . . Yet so great was the multitude of those who cried, 'Kill him, kill him at once,' that they began to smite him. And if the first had tried to protect him they also would have been slain with him; and so great was the number of those that wished to smite that in the throng they wounded one another. . . . And when he was dead all that were there ran and seized the flesh of him and ate it, raw as it was, like dogs or swine; so that nothing was left of his wretched, miserable body. Yea, had he been as huge as a giant he would not have sufficed to give his enemies to eat. And if any one had had an ounce of that flesh to sell he could have found those who would have bought it for a golden ducat; but none was left. . . . So he fell by the just judgment of God, in requital for the deeds he had done in his lifetime."

We do not know what the Higher Criticism will make of this story: for ourselves, we must decline to swallow it all. Nor have we much more respect for the signs and portents which accompanied the doings and dealings of the elect at times of crisis or of peril. And yet these stories, taken as a whole, ring true. They are written with a rare verve, a peculiar sharpness and clearness. The pure skies of Italy are here reflected as in a burnished mirror. Women play but an insignificant part in the plots and counterplots which are developed, but now and then we catch a glimpse of an Atalanta, heroic and pathetic, or of a Lucrezia, boldly depicted—"bearing the great banner of all loose women"; and so the pageant is unfolded line by line. The book is hereby heartily commended to all lovers of Italy. Matarazzo's name, and that of his skilful translator, Mr. Morgan, must henceforward be honourably coupled whenever "Perusia Augusta" or the Baglioni, so long her masters, succeed in thrusting themselves on our remembrance.

TRAVEL IN SYRIA

In a Syrian Saddle. By A. GOODRICH-FREER. (Methuen, 7s. 6d. net.)

"HERE in this wild wilderness, an unfinished dream of the sculptor of a giant age, stood the castle of Mshatta; paralysing us with such awe of its beauty and mystery, the unique perfection of its workmanship. . . . We were speechless in presence of this monument of a race to which we could give no name, of a purpose at which we could not even guess."

This was on the far side of the Jordan in the land of Gilead, a land all but unknown, having been traversed by only a few scientists and a few missionaries. The castle referred to is perhaps the supreme architectural puzzle of the world. With a façade a hundred and fifty-six feet long, covered with a mass of sculpture, it remains to speak of an unknown race, and an unknown style; no one can even guess at its builders or at the intention for which it was erected. Miss Goodrich-Freer had exceptional privileges in her visit to this fascinating and mysterious building, for she, the only lady, went with a party of men one of whom was a world-famous savant, who, we have reason to believe, though she discreetly does not reveal the fact, was sent for no less an object than to select and detach a part of this wonderful carving as a present from the Sultan to the Kaiser.

The book is an account of two journeys of which the one above referred to, by far the most interesting, occupied only ten days. The other was to the better-known lands to the west of the Jordan. Miss Goodrich-Freer has a happy knack of absorbing and interpreting a country through which she passes, as those who enjoyed her "Outer Isles" will know. But here she has obviously found it a little difficult to make bricks without straw. Her journeys were too short and slight, and with the exception of Mshatta the places she visited of too little interest to make an absorbing book. Yet there are plums not a few, and the book is at any rate readable everywhere. After it is done some faint essence of the fascination of the East lingers with us. We can see the "vast spaces with dim horizons, bounded by low ranges of hills, showing in deep purple against the cloudless sapphire sky;" we can sympathise with the longing which the sight of the distant hills of Moab implants in the breasts of those who live near Jerusalem; we feel afresh the marvel of that land of a civilisation so ancient that ours is but as a mushroom to an oak in comparison. In one very striking parallel the author compares the excavation of a "Tell" to the case of the city of York, which she imagines in the course of ages to have been covered up by a grass-grown mound higher than the minster towers; it is as if a party of men in the far future should send a vertical shaft through the middle and come to the Roman city, and to two or three cities below that, before they began their operation of searching for relics.

The human note is struck in telling of the company with which she performed the journey; and Miss Goodrich-Freer has hit on the rather happy method of labelling the party; she herself is The Lady, though it might not always be gathered from the strictly impersonal way in which the narrative is told; and the Doctor is he to whom the book is dedicated, and with whom by this time she has and obviously correct way. Thus, again and again the reader is confronted with the Professor's prefaces, sandwiched between the facsimile title of the old poem and its dedicatory verses or the author's preface, an arrangement as clumsy and unnecessary as it is misleading.

Professor Saintsbury's General Introduction strikes a much-needed note in its plea for a wider recognition of "second-rate" writers: no fruitful work in any period of English literature can result unless ample attention is paid to the many as well as to the few. Only after study of the many can general tendencies be clearly seen, and mere justice be done to those outbursts of splendour in the few whom we call great poets. In our ignorance of the principles of literary history and literary criticism we speak of these isolated manifestations as original genius, much as the old-fashioned theologian speaks of original sin: crests of waves we should the rather call them, impossible save for the movement beneath. In this matter of literary criticism in the General Introduction to the present volume and in the separate introductions to the poets whose works are included in it, Professor Saintsbury is on his own ground. Those who have learned from him in the past, who have admired, with envy, his stores of knowledge concerning the many as well as the few, who can ignore, or pardon, his wilfully crabbed style, which seems at times deliberately to choose the more crooked way in which to explain his meaning, know that they will be certain to meet with sane views, balanced by a sense of proportion born of acquaintance with many literatures. They will welcome the announcement that a "History of English Prosody" is to follow the recently completed "History of Literary Criticism," and they will remember many long-past reviews belonging to the old London days in the discussion of the question "Is the delight here?" though with a feeling that the Professor's statement that an affirmative answer to the question wins the case in his imaginary final court of appeal might easily be invalidated by an answer to a further question, "Whom does the poem delight?"

So far we read with profit and with pleasure, until we reach the postscript to the General Introduction, and here there is just cause for complaint.

"The principles of editing," says Professor Saintsbury, "which have been adopted can be very shortly set forth. . . . The spelling has been subjected to the very small amount of modernisation necessary to make it uniform with the only uniformity which is at all possible."

The punctuation, too, has undergone revision, and it is pleaded that these interferences are made in the interest of the student. Now, what is the case? Of the few people who are interested in English literature, a very few only will or can concern themselves with minor poets of the Caroline period, and these will be professed students, with some knowledge of seventeenth-century printing, anxious to possess trustworthy texts, especially in such cases as these where the originals are hard to come by: they will naturally resent any tampering with the text; they will ask: "Why the need for uniformity, since uniformity was far from being a characteristic of the age when the poems were written and printed?" These volumes are not cheap classics for the University Extension student, they are not pretty volumes for the boudoir: their size, their weight, their bulk relegate them to the library shelf. To modernise these rare poems is to take away from them the charm (not without its literary value) always associated with the reading of a text as nearly as possible in its original form; the alterations are needless for any purpose we can imagine; they give the student an uneasy feeling that he is being played with, for he does not know to what extent he has been pampered. The habit sufficed in the days of Gifford and Cunningham and Dyce; it met the needs of Weber and Singer, for there was a time when it was deemed a kindly thought to amend the grotesque spelling and punctuation of our forefathers in the patronising spirit of days thought to be enlightened. But to-day? It is unscientific and, curiously, a distinct loss in the case of all editions intended for serious use. Professor Saintsbury endeavours to justify himself in his "Introduction to Edward Benlowes." It is a purely gratuitous assumption that to "give poetry must necessarily give it 'the best chance of producing any poetical effect of which it is capable'; it may be so with a few, who are not likely to read the works in question, it will certainly not with others, and the Professor gives away a good part of his case when he says: 'the extraordinary 'harlequin' effect of the original printing: 'Theophila' . . . emphasises unduly, for modern readers, the already sufficient eccentricity of the text.' Exactly so; it is a part of the original milieu, and the modern reader is deprived of its aid by the fad of modernising."

Nor do we see what benefit is conferred by recording Singer's generally needless emendations of Chamberlayne's "Pharonnida," especially as Professor Saintsbury himself rejects them again and again as unnecessary. "A first acquaintance with edited texts," writes one of the best known of English scholars, "has taught me that ignorance and conceit are the fruitful parents of conjectural emendation"; and with this general statement we are more than inclined to agree. Professor Saintsbury's own notes are excellent of their kind, commendably brief and rarely intrusive: we should have been glad of a few more on the historical and biographical side, for the opportunity of editing these minor worthies is one that will not soon recur.

Of the writers whose poems are represented in this first volume, Chamberlayne is probably familiar to readers of Southey, Benlowes little more than a name to most students of English literature: a few will have turned from the reference to him in the "Dunciad" to Warburton's note, still fewer will have read Butler's "Character of a Small Poet." The case of Mrs. Katherine Philips "the Matchless Orinda," is different. Her verses are known to all students of seventeenth-century poetry, and it is a great boon to have them reprinted. Readers of Cowley's verses on her death will now more easily be able to turn to her poems and ascertain for themselves how far the comparison with Pope Joan is justified. The text adopted seems to be that of 1678: we wonder why. The folio of 1667, published three years after her death, seems to have the prior claim.

THE MYSTIC'S PRAYER

LAY me to sleep in sheltering flame,
O Master of the Hidden Fire:
Wash pure my heart, and cleanse for me
My soul's desire.

In flame of sunrise bathe my mind,
O Master of the Hidden Fire,
That, when I wake, clear-eyed may be
My soul's desire.

SENIOR WRANGLERS

Is it well for a man who wants to succeed in life to begin by being a Senior Wrangler? The question is debated, and perhaps debatable. The popular view seems to be that the Senior Wrangler is a plant that flowers too early and is destined to premature decay. He is, we are told, to drop metaphor—"played out"—as the result of his excessive labours; whereas the Second, Third, and other Wranglers retain "a bit in hand" which, after the Tripos is over, enables them to pass him in the race. But is this really so? Suppose we take a Cambridge Calendar, and a Dictionary of National Biography, and see.

In the race for the episcopal bench, at any rate, it is the and Wranglers who are the winners. Nine of them, only seven of the Seniors, have become Bishops. But, of course, one Bishop differs from another Bishop in glory. There is one glory of the Archbishop of Canterbury and another glory of the Bishop of Rumbold. So that these statistics may very well be misleading—more especially as the habit of consecrating distinguished mathematicians to episcopacy has for many years been on the decline. The days of Porteus (Tenth Wrangler in 1752), Pretymann (Senior Wrangler in 1772), and Blomfield (Third Wrangler in 1808), it was the rule. Since the time of Goodwin of Exeter (Second Wrangler in 1840), it has been the exception; and the practice of the Bishop-makers has been, more and more, to lay hands hastily on some Junior Optime. Perhaps, therefore, the best way of getting a bird's-eye view of the subject such as may justify a generalisation is to consider separately:

1) The cases in which the Second, or other High Wrangler has been obviously a bigger man than the Senior.

2) The cases in which the Senior Wrangler is admittedly more distinguished than the Second or any other near him on the list.

3) The cases in which Senior and Second Wranglers have both achieved considerable, and approximately equal, distinction.

The first example of our first case is Bishop Porteus of Exeter, the Tenth Wrangler already mentioned; and perhaps he is too low down on the list to count. Our next instance occurs in 1771, when the Third Wrangler, Law of Peterhouse, afterwards Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough, was distinctly a bigger man than his two Seniors, Starkie and John's, and Kedington of Caius; our third in 1777, when the first name on the list that one recognises at a glance is that of the Fifth Wrangler, Lord Manners, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland of whom O'Connell said that he was "the most sensible looking man talking nonsense that he ever saw."

Now we must take a jump to 1816. The Senior Wrangler of that year was one Jacob, known to those who knew him as a K.C. and the author of a treatise on the Law of Real Property; the Second Wrangler was Whewell, who is known to all the world. In 1827, the Fourth Wrangler, Augustus de Morgan, of high mathematical fame, was of more account than any one of his three seniors, or than all of them put together. Similarly with Ritchard, the astronomer, Fourth Wrangler in 1830. Then, in 1836, we find an unknown Smith of Trinity second to Colenso, Bishop of Natal, and, in 1837, an unknown Griffin of Saint John's senior to Sylvester, the geometrician. In 1840 Harvey Goodwin, Bishop of Carlisle, was second to R. L. Ellis of Trinity, who began to edit Bacon in conjunction with Spedding, but who fell into bad health and died without doing anything for which he is widely remembered. Next follows a famous case. In 1845 Parkinson of John's, known as the author of a very creditable treatise on Optics, was Senior to the Thompson of Trinity who became Lord Kelvin. The Second Wrangler was, even at the time, notoriously the more brilliant man of the two; but Parkinson was the faster worker. For months before the examination he had secretly practised "pace" under Senate House conditions, and could write out the answers to more questions than his opponent in the allotted time, so that "Parkinson's pace" was long, and perhaps still is, a saying at Cambridge. Passing on to 1855, we find Mr. Leonard Courtney second to a Savage of John's, whose name suggests nothing; and we note that, in 1856, the greatest of the Wranglers was Professor Fawcett, who was seventh, and that, in 1857, the third on the roll of the Wranglers, Sir John Gorst, is first on the roll of fame.

Now for the cases in which posterity, as well as the examiners, awards the Senior Wrangler the palm. We shall find that they are numerous. Let us print the list in the form of a table, first noting that where we give no information about the Second Wrangler it is because we have none of any general interest to give.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

PLACES

IN the leafy month of June even the bookworm becomes like a snail in its shell when rain is coming. He turns his mind to Arcady with a "God! for the little brooks that tumble as they run!" He would fain away from his musty library to the lane, now fragrant with the opening wild roses, or to the cliff where he can hear the waves breaking against the rocks and feel his nostrils assailed by the saltiness of the sea-wind. Ah me! Little do we reckon of books when the gorse is shining in acres of yellow gold; and yet it is strange what a hankering some people have after the footsteps of the illustrious. "And did you once see Shelley plain?" It is the hero worship of youth. As we grow older and get to hob-nob with celebrities the dream and the illusion appear to fade away. For your great man is just like the rest of us. He has his moments, but so has the greatest dullard on earth. He is frequently bored and just as often himself a bore to others. Play with him at golf or bridge and you soon learn that his greatness has its infirmities and that they are singularly like those of other people. Not that he becomes commonplace either, unless when looked upon with a commonplace eye. He is no hero to his valet, nor to anybody who has only the mind of a valet; but the discerning also know that the gold is hidden under loads of earth.

This probably looks more like digression than it actually is. My theme at the moment is the particular kind of hero-worship that takes the form of studying the places where-with great men have been associated. It was a weakness of my own callow days. Long ago I remember once penetrating into the heart of that wild west where Carlyle came from, and in the village of Ecclefechan searching out the birthplace of the seer. When shown the very room in which he first saw the light, I could not help asking: "Was Carlyle really born there?" "Ay, that was he," replied the stout dame who was showing the room, adding as though the fact were of even greater importance: "And oor Maggie was born in the varra same bed." It seemed to dissolve a little of the romance in laughter, but yet it was good to feel that little cottage Maggie and Thomas shared the great events of life in common. For the rest, it was pleasant enough to learn something of the environment in which little "Tam" spent his youth, how one relative had been noted for a great striker and another "hunted" in defiance of the game laws. And it was easy to reconstruct the old peasant life of Scotland with its scantiness of money and frequent lack of food. It is a life that has passed away, and given place to one of big vulgar towns, of clerks and travellers, of tall hats and eating-houses, but it was out of the ancient frugal, hard-living Scotland that the men came who carried the country's fame to the ends of the earth. In that the peasant had as great a share as the noble.

Leave the cottage and the peasant, and on the wings of fancy cross from the West to the East of that wild Borderland where every valley seems yet to ring with the slogan and every stream has its romance. Our wishing-cap has set us down in the Scott country, in the land of one who was almost an aristocrat by birth and wholly one by temperament. Perhaps it was natural that the peasant should be the more strenuous of the two. One of the few friends of Carlyle who still survive him was telling me about Carlyle the other day, of his thick peasant lips and strong face, of his vehemence and still more of his robust laugh. But the comparison of the two shows how potent is association in the formation of literary character. Obviously if they had changed places and Scott had been born into a peasant's cottage it is extremely unlikely that he would ever have gathered that store of legendary knowledge and romance that formed the groundwork of his novels. Browning, in one of his poems, talks of "plastic circumstances" meant to give the soul its bent," but probably he was undervaluing circumstance. Greatness in most cases to be the result when genius is brought into the environment most calculated to develop it. Scott had the Border blood in his veins, and therefore, as he tells us himself, was from childhood interested in the numerable tales of feud and fray, which, at the time he lived, were still recounted from personal memory. He had also that genius for romance which finds its outlet in the raving of a river like the Tweed and the murmur of the wind through pine-forests. I have sometimes thought when at Dryburgh with the river in the past that there might be some truth in his own words that "mute Nature mourns her worshipper." But Ruskin would doubtless have said that was one part of the "pathetic fallacy." And the longer we live the less do we feel about it. Nature's indifference to man, all his works becomes more fully demonstrated with new experience of life. The sun shines equally upon evil and the good, and the wind blows with no more regard than is put into it by the brain and heart of him who feels it. However, that is by the way. What I meant to say out was how Carlyle and Scott, living practically during the same period, had their own minds imbued with and turned to their fellows two utterly different and opposed new life. One saw all its seriousness and the grim problems that have to be asked and answered between the cradle and the grave. The other was overpowered by its romance and by the nobility of which human nature is capable. With this the element of place had much to do. In that cottage in the West where life was so difficult to support, the theory "laborare est orare" seems a fitting natural outcome. In the more romantic East with its traditions and memories the opposite seems to be equally at home. The writers have owed much to this marriage of circumstance and temperament is proved, if by nothing else, by the fact that we find in those less happily placed. Among the childhood of R. L. Stevenson, for instance, lingers an air of suburbanism that we can never get rid of. It is true that he has pleasant memories of hill, and sea, and island, but they came to him later in life. He was not truly "bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh." The same thing might be said of one who was greater than he—the author of "Esmond." In a sense it might be said that Thackeray scarcely had a childhood. From birth until he began to settle in life he was moved from place to place and had no opportunity of forming those deep-rooted associations which to the end of his life coloured the work of a man like the late Lord Tennyson. No doubt there is nothing indispensable to genius. Thackeray rose superior to this misfortune of his childhood; but we can very well imagine how much charm would have been added to his work if his fate in this respect had been other than it was. So with Charles Dickens. The strong qualities that made a writer of him were undoubtedly independent of any association, but the squalor of his childhood certainly bereft his writing of some of that charm which it might otherwise have had. A thousand other memories of place crowd into the mind as I write; of Lichfield which exercised so strong an influence on the mind of Johnson; of Coate which even like a dream that would not pass away haunted the mind of him who wrote the "Gamekeeper at Home"; of Leamington Warwicksire that was so vividly reflected in the earliest and best of the long novels of George Eliot. But it would be tedious to go on with the enumeration. My point here is that sight-seeing is like view-hunting, one of the poorest occupations which humanity can engage in, but at the same time there is no study more delightful than that of endeavouring to understand the connection that there has been between any one who by virtue of his own intellectual force attained greatness, and the surroundings of his childhood which moulded that intellectual force and endowed it with a more exquisite charm.

FICTION

Day's Journey. By NETTA SYRETT. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

THE reader who makes a pleasant entrance into this story through the "little gate set between two walls of yew" at once gives admittance to the country home of Robert Anglake and Cecily his wife has already a premonition that, unlike the sun-dial on the cover, it marks other than many hours. The title, coupled with the fly-leaf verse from Christina Rossetti's poem, will have shown that the road is to "wind up-hill all the way," and as the journey progresses it becomes apparent that over the one tempting turning-place the author has set a double, if not, indeed, a triple guard. It is just this well-handled resolution to follow the road to the summit that makes the tale worth telling. The scheme at the outset is not uncommon either in real life or in fiction. Cecily, a brilliant girl, mated (at least to her heart's complete content) with one of the gens mirabile scriptorum, finds after two or three years of secluded married life, during which she has borne and lost a child, that her husband's passion has spent its force and that he has struck up a "beautiful breezy friendship" with a serpentine and "artistic" young woman who is fooling him, from the most sordid motives, to the top of his bent. Neither in the situation nor in the fact that, just as the discovery of the truth is hardening her, an old lover and an old friend range up to the rescue of some of her happiness is there anything calling for special remark. The silver thread, as it were, of the story lies in its record of the tender, purely womanly, instinct which turns a devoted wife into one who can mother her husband out of the depths of her pity and love when his selfish folly and its results have left him like a penitent child who "wants her very much." "Oh Robin," she cries as he comes back to her, "what a thin little boy." "And then—she gave a curious little sound, half laugh, half cry—'men are such babies, aren't they? I can pretend he's my little boy!'" Women, we think, will be the best critics of this story. Mere men may fairly wish, however, that Miss Syrett had left any saving graces that Robin may have possessed a little less to the difficult masculine imagination.

Love in June. By KEBLE HOWARD. With Illustrations by FRANK REYNOLDS, R.I. (Chapman & Hall, 6s.)

WHEN an artist flies from London in the early June days, finds himself in comfortable quarters in an old country inn, waited upon by a lovely maiden with an unmistakable air of good breeding, the end of the story is an open secret, and the artist's fate foretold. Love, however, does not run too smoothly; there are obstacles and disappointments before the prize is won. It is all delightful and unworldly, this sojourn amid pastoral scenes and shrewd kindly country folk, who are sketched for us in a friendly spirit and in the most favourable light. There is humour, too, in the rustic courtship of the maid, the ostler, and the postman, and around all an atmosphere of leisure, good nature and romance that has an attraction of its own. Altogether a well-written story that should find many readers.

Tolla the Courtesan. By E. RODOCANACHI. Translated from the Italian by FREDERICK LAWTON. (Heinemann, 6s.)

THE title might lead one to imagine that here "luridness and lustre link": but this is very far from being the case. The book contains a picture, worked out with elaborate care for the most minute detail, of daily life in Rome in the year 1700. There are sixty-one letters supposed to be written by a French lord, who has been obliged to fly from France, to the lady of his love. Through these letters runs the thin thread of the story of the famous Vittoria or Tolla Boccadileone, of her love-affair with the son of the Queen of Poland, and of her ultimate ruin. But this is the merest pretext for giving M. Rodocanachi an opportunity to produce the result of his research into the life of capacity for inflated rhetoric, the same impecuniosity, the same distribution of I.O.U.s. But there is this essential difference: Mr. Chippendale gives us none of the delightful things Micawber excelled in. From our knowledge of the colonial temper, we are quite sure the inhabitants of Cook's Island would have scoffed at Mr. Chippendale's grandiloquent speeches, refused his "acceptances," and broken his head. Mr. Fellows admits that the advisability of taking lessons in composition occurred to him; and we regret that there the matter ended. Those lessons might have taught him the absurdity of aping Dickens, and spared us misspellings, repetitions, incorrect quotations, the perpetual recurrence of the word "reliable," and similar errors.

FINE ART

THE ROYAL ACADEMY

(SECOND NOTICE)

It is advisable to let some time elapse before giving a definitive opinion on the Royal Academy or any other exhibition. The "exhibition headache" is not the best condition in which to judge fairly of pictures. The public that knows and understands—which is only a very small minority of those who frequent the Royal Academy—has recently shown impatience verging on unfairness in the treatment of this exhibition, but a calm unprejudiced mind must own that there is a vast deal of very considerable talent displayed, unfortunately, in most cases, in wrong and perverse directions. The most striking defect which runs throughout modern work, and perhaps more in the Royal Academy than elsewhere, is the absence of ideas: a deficiency which is almost universal now, but which would have been singular in preceding generations. If we have the curiosity to peep in next door to the Academy, in the Diploma Gallery, containing comparatively recent work, we shall find not a single canvas that is not informed by an idea—a good or a bad idea—and well or ill executed, but still an idea. The perverse notion, artistic, or decorative ideas can be supplied by literary or mythic, or in an Italian landscape amidst olives and vines does not constitute ideal painting, and the delusion is remarkable chiefly in being almost universal. The popular opinion is that the President, at least, still holds up the banner; but however the themes may vary, there is not a pin to choose between their treatment by Sir Edward Poynter, Mr. Sargent, Mr. La Thangue and Mr. Tuke—to take some names almost at random. The slight differences of treatment arise from purely material conditions. The passivity of the sun-flecked stones of The Cup of Tantalus allowed the painter greater scope for realism than the flickering movement of Mr. La Thangue's sea and shadow, and hence the trompe l'œil of the former is more striking than in the latter. This does not of course make Mr. La Thangue a more ideal painter than Sir Edward. That is another delusion, more prevalent on the Continent, fortunately, than in England, that failure to execute a realistic conception constitutes success in an idealistic one.

But an idealistic picture begins and ends with an idea. Sir Edward Poynter has allowed his original idea, poor little nestling, to be hustled out by that great bullying cuckoo, Nature. Whistler, one of the greatest of idealists, never allowed Nature to bully him, but calmly proceeded on lines he had laid down from the beginning. It is true that Whistler was so far modern and so far less of an idealist than the ancients that the ruling principle of his idealism was that of selection and omission. This was not the case, for instance, of Gainsborough in his landscapes, or George Morland. I select these names rather than such as are acknowledged idealists in subject, Botticelli or Watts, because the idealism of the latter is entirely pictorial and is not confused in our minds with literary associations. Nevertheless there is not a trace of Hobbema, Morland or Gainsborough that is in any sense realistic. The idealism of these men lay not so much even in greater part, in the art of selection; it lay in a preconceived idea of what Nature looked like, a kind of inner vision—a convention, if you like to call it. Hobbema's and Gainsborough's trees do not in the least resemble photographs of trees, not because they are short of complete realisation, but because they never intended with that intention.

Of this great and bold conception of art there is not a trace to be found either in the Academy or in any other exhibition at the present day. Wherever there is a trace of this influence, as for instance, in Mr. Alfred East's landscapes, it unfortunately only serves to confuse the issue. There is a lack of frankness about Mr. East's work which is not atoned for by increase of scholarly workmanship. The painting is as messy and indigestible as any modern work, and has not the excuse, if excuse there be, of being a transcript from Nature. The two doors are open—frank conventionality or frank realism; the former appears to be incompatible in our temper with any virility or real invention, we turn with such whole-hearted performances as Mr. Mark E. B. Landscapes, Mr. Arthur Meade's extremely capable in the manner of Monet, The Merry Springtime, Mr. C. Symons' vigorous sketch of children playing Sunday, Charles Sims' Washing-day, and Mr. Harrington's Good Morning. Mr. Frank Bramley's realism, in the form of an elaborate Grasmere Rush-bearing, has the taste of a costume piece, although dealing with a modern scene. All these works are worthy of some consideration, but can be said of very few of the more idealistic pictures.

But among these latter it is curious to note that the most able are by Frenchmen. The Gentilhomme, Louisa, is a learned pastiche by M. Jean Casse, and the Fruits of M. Arthur Chaplin is still more out of harmony with its surroundings in its reminiscence of van Hout and Hondecoeter, the formal flower-piece, elaborately finished, but with no pretensions to reality.

THE BOSTON VELASQUEZ

WE have received a copy of the "Report of the Association regarding the new Velasquez" at the Boston Museum issued in the bi-monthly bulletin, and we are struck by its thoroughness. It might appear that any view of the collection of the authorities in purchasing the picture of Philip IV., was hardly necessary, since the picture is undoubtedly genuine. But those who uphold its genuineness such as Mr. Phillips, Don Pedro de Madrazo, Mr. Bernhardt Berenson, Mr. Lichfield, and Mr. Charles Curtis, the "Gamekeeper at Hon. English," and Mr. Mason Perkins, George Eliot, and Aureliano de Beruete, and his opinion on the matter is to excessive severity, so that, like some of our English masters, he will not allow a dull connection to be ascribed to the hand of the master. The connoisseurs, and especially Bostonians, exhibit a sensitiveness about questions of the authenticity acquired by them; but since the matter had been completely settled as it is in this pamphlet. Yet it strikes one as singular that no mention is made of the very singular picture, ascribed to Velasquez, in the collection of Gardner of Boston. It was well known here, having been exhibited at the Old Masters when it was in the collection of Mr. Ralph Banks of Kingston. It was ascribed by Professor n picture) to the hand of Velasquez himself. It is identical with the Prado portrait, as there are slight differences in the position and drawing of the hat. In any case concerning the early portraits of Philip IV. this would naturally come into question, especially as it is a private collection in the same city, and the fact to mention it shows a modesty not usually accorded to citizens of Boston.

ART SALES

During the Whitsuntide vacation, Art Sales have been few and unimportant. In the sale last week at Messrs. Sotheby's of the collection of Greek and Roman coins formed by Mr. P. Harlan Smith, of New York, some fair prices were realised: Catana, tetradrachm by Euainetos, £170 (Spink); Syracuse, silver medallion by Persephone to left, £91 (same); Acanthus, tetradrachm attacking bull, £61 (same); Locris, Locri Opuntii, stater, Persephone to left, and two hemidrachms, £65 10s. (Rollin). On Wednesday Messrs. Christie sold a collection of old English plate, formerly the property of Colonel S. P. Groves. A Queen Anne two-handled cup, embossed with a corded band, by John Cory, £68 (Webster); a William III. two-handed porringer, embossed with a corded band and spiral fluting, by A. Roode, £64 (Heigham); and a plain double sauce-boat, by John Smith, £62 (S. J. Phillips). On the same day Messrs. Knight, Frank and Rutley sold a fine first edition of Whistler's "The Lime Burner," with a pencilled inscription "For Mother, from J. Whistler," for 50 gs.; and a good edition, first state, of "The Kitchen" for 30 gs.

"NOTRE JEUNESSE" AT THE SHAFTESBURY THEATRE

Jeunesse was the pick of the season's French successes. No doubt it was better as rendered by the French cast at the Théâtre Français; but M. Coquelin's action was quite good enough to show any intelligent spectator in what respects they order theatrical matters in France than we do in England. Alike in the method and in the playing there was more of the art that we are accustomed to. M. Coquelin is well entitled though he is to consider himself a Star, but he magnifies himself into a Moon. His part being so important, he seems satisfied that it should be small. He does not tamper with the author's text, requiring that his soliloquies should be allotted to him, or that he should always be in the centre of the stage at the fall of the curtain. He does not try in any way to make the part "greater than the whole. Similarly with the other actors, and notably with Mesdames Moréno and Sylvie. They all dress appropriately, but none of them over-dress, nor do they wear their dresses self-consciously, or strike attitudes in the manner of Mrs. Brown Potter, or enter to slow music, or do anything in the limelight alone. They make their points without over-emphasising them; they neither over-act, nor make their speeches at, the audience. For the whole company, in fact, the play is the thing. To the effect all the incidental effects are subordinated. The restraint and the sense of proportion prevail; and there is no trace of amateurishness in the performance of even the least of the players—of him, to wit, who has nothing to do but stand in a gorgeous livery, open the door, and announce that the play is about to begin. It is not allowed a dull day itself the best thing we can say is that it is a masterpiece of the very thing we ought to be wanting in our theatres. By Bostonians, exhibited for the literary drama. What we do speak of the literary drama is, as a rule, as a matter of fact, a date by an Elizabethan, or something of the kind. Yet it strikes one as rather our intellectual combativeness and made of the very same material by Mr. Bernard Shaw. But it is

EMOTION AND TRUTH

ACCORDING to the usual classification, our modes of consciousness may be either sensations, perceptions, conceptions or emotions. The concern of what Baumgarten called æsthetics is with the last of these. Now all facts are part of Truth, including such facts as that a picture or a song affects one in a certain way—excites a certain state of emotion. But the great concept of Truth is of an order of facts which is independent of the percipient, or is, as we say, objectively true. Like all concepts, this is intellectual, not emotional.

An emotion is a subjective and personal thing. It is your emotion or mine or some one else's; it necessarily implies a personal subject or possessor. The content of an emotion is true in the sense that all facts are true; and the subject of this emotion may exercise his distinctively human power of self-consciousness, and, by turning his attention upon himself, may introspectively recognise the fact of the occurrence of his emotion as an objective truth. But it behoves him carefully to distinguish. For instance, I may have the emotion of hate aroused in me by a certain man. It is a fact—and therefore part of truth—that I have that emotion; but on the other hand, you love that man, and this emotion, which contradicts mine, is as true for you as mine is for me; whilst an impartial third may record your hate and my love as facts both objectively true. Now, if the Cosmos be a Cosmos, no fact in it contradicts any other. Nevertheless, I shall be heard positively asserting that this man is hateful; and you, as positively, and with equal "reason," that he is lovable. Plainly we are both right, in that we speak of a fact we know, and none can know so well; but we are both wrong in that we imagine our knowledge to be a fact of the man in question, whereas it is not a fact about him at all, but about ourselves. I am apparently right in asserting him to be hateful, you in asserting him to be lovable; but plainly he cannot be both. In truth, he is hateful to me, and lovable to you: in other words, the content of my emotion is a fact about me, and the content of yours is a fact about you. Were we discussing our friend or enemy in a smoking-room, we should agree that, in short, I hate him, and you love him. Whilst our emotions are precious beyond price we must guard against imagining that their contents tell us anything about their objects. The fact that I hate the man is by no means necessarily damaging to him (I may be one of those described by Milton, "by whom to be dispraised were no small praise"), but may be most-damaging to me; whilst the fact that you love him is by no means necessarily laudatory of him, but may be the worst thing that could be said about you.

This, like so many of the important things, is all quite obvious, and, even though we have never met it formally stated on paper in the "jargon of psychology," we may safely say that we always knew it. But we have a way of hiding this our light under a bushel. We do not always talk as if we were aware that our emotions are facts of ourselves and not of their objects. Perhaps I hear a song by Schubert, or Stephen Adams, and say "That is a good song." Now I might conceivably be entitled to say so. I might have made so profound a study of æsthetics in general and of the æsthetics of song-writing in particular, and I might have so much power of exposition as to be able to "prove" that it is a good song. But, in point of fact, I certainly cannot, having, to begin with, very vague notions as to the validity of the criteria in any such attempted "proof." Not having these qualifications, I am entirely unwarranted in making any assertion about the merit of the song; and am warranted merely in saying: "That song excites pleasurable emotion in me," or, in the vernacular, "I like that song." This manner of speech may sound very egoistical, as compared with: "That is a good song," but it really is by far the more modest of the two. For if some one should ask why I call the song good, I should be forced to reply that I say so because I like it, whereupon it will appear that my assertion as to the goodness of the song contained a further (implicit) assertion as to the goodness of my taste in songs. I like it is good! Similarly, I hate you: ergo, you are hateful. The grossness of the error is obvious, but we all come to imagining assertions about ourselves to be assertions about something or some one else. In this matter the philosopher's discrimination is with the author of the lines on Dr. Johnson. He clearly understood that he was making an assertion not about the doctor but about himself.

The application of all this to the art criticism one reads is evident enough. In so far as a work of art is subject to the judgment of the intellect—as the remote derivation of the word art shows it must always be—the critic may be justified in pronouncing it to be good or bad; that is, objectively good or bad. No matter who the critic, he must have some measure of competence in this respect. As to the structure or form of any work of art, being ultimately reducible by a perfect intellect to a series of mathematical expressions, is not the vital, the truly artistic thing; as the bowels of a motor-car are a work of art. The artistic thing is precisely that upon which no critic, in the present state of our knowledge, can express an opinion. He can express, however, what is much more than an opinion: he can tell us how the thing affected him, and that is not a matter of opinion, but of the most certain knowledge accessible to the human mind. That way lies safety: the "feeling-tone of sensation" is affected by many things—the weather, the digestion, repetition, more repetition, and so forth. Hence the critic who said: "This is a good opera" on one occasion may wish he had not said so on the next, when he finds it deadly dull. He is, however, he be a psychologist, as every good critic is, will merely have said on the first occasion: "I like it," and on the next he is free to say: "This time I do not like it." Whereat the groundlings, but not the judicious, will grieve.

When we realise the precise importance of the emotional nature of the "æsthete" (there is no other generic word we are able to understand, without the usual amazement, the diversity of opinion. Wordsworth saw nothing in Keats; Wagner and Brahms thought each other's music worthless: but, on our theory, they were very foolish to say so, for what they thought to be assertions about each other's music were really assertions about themselves. And the curious thing is that we, who could not have written a bar of either's music, can respond to the emotional appeal of both.

One more point. We "dry-light-of-reason" students maintain that men can always express their knowledge in words. This the amateur of art is apt to deny: he hears the so-called "Moonlight" Sonata, or sees a Rembrandt, and says: "I know that is good, but I cannot tell you why." To which I answer, he knows nothing of the sort. What he knows is that the music or the picture deeply affects him. It is knowledge of his own emotions, and that is why he cannot give a reason for it. I do not believe that there is any rational knowledge which cannot be expressed in words. No student of psychology believes it. Thoughts too deep for speech are not thoughts at all, but emotions. Far be it from me to decry them; life would not be worth living without them, and indeed would not be life without them. The insane patient who experiences no emotions is alive only in the biological sense; but that is no reason why we should misuse language, and confound emotional with rational states of consciousness.

The reader will perceive that this question is of supreme philosophic importance: for the implication is more than merely that art-criticism is necessarily subjective. If emotional states have no validity as criteria of any facts of the not-self; if your "knowledge which words are too coarse to convey" is not knowledge but emotion, we must utilise these conclusions in attempting to om the mystics and the poets. If these things are rdsworth's sublime ode is no more, philosophically,

not leave me in this dark corner under the earth," the dying Schubert to his brother, "do I not deserve ace above ground?" It would seem as if in this ch, prompted by the delirium of his last moments, who was ever the meekest, shyest, most unassuming geniuses made a final appeal for recognition from the ld. We are therefore the more grateful for the recent dition to the lives of the "Master-Musicians"— Schubert" by Edmonstone Duncan (Dent, 3s. 6d. net)— which is under consideration here.

It is a charming volume, containing portraits and a list works: and in these days when much purely lyrical music is relegated to a "dark corner under the earth," the sympathetic pages of his latest biographer will help to confirm Schubert in the "place above ground" for which sighed; a place, that is, with the Immortals. Schubert is ever beloved by his brothers in Art. Schumann writes his music that "it carries with it the germs of everlasting youth." "Truly in Schubert there is the divine spark!" cries Beethoven, whose last days were soothed and brightened by the study of the younger composer's songs. To quote Mr. Duncan:

"More than one visit was paid by Schubert to the bedside of the dying master. The first seems to have been in the company of Anselm Güttenbrenner. They were announced by Schindler (a mutual friend) who asked which was first to be admitted. 'Schubert may come first,' was Beethoven's reply. And afterwards when they were together he added: 'You, Anselm, have my mind, but Franz has my soul.' . . . At the funeral on March 29 Schubert acted as one of the thirty-eight torch-bearers who preceded the coffin. They were dressed in full mourning with white roses and bunches of lilies fastened to the crêpe on their arms." . . .

Returning with his friends from the ceremony, Schubert

"entered the Mehlgrube tavern and called for wine. There he drank to the memory of the great man whom they had just seen laid in his resting-place. A second glass was then drunk to the first of the assembled friends who should follow. Alas! it was Schubert himself."

He died at the early age of thirty-one, leaving behind him an incredible quantity of beautiful compositions. A list of these as published in Messrs. Breitkopf and Haertel's
"new, critical and complete edition" is given at the end of Mr. Duncan's book. He truly says:

"So rich is the legacy of beautiful work that one may be excused hesitation in pointing to the masterpieces where these are so plentiful.
Turn where we may—to symphony or sonata, to opera or oratorio, or to the chamber-music with its marvellous array of songs—at each step we are greeted by some lovely treasure. . . . It is Schubert's proud boast—a posthumous one, it is true, for pride held no place in his life—that he has enriched every department of music with a masterpiece."

"We shall probably find," says Kreissle, "that in none of the great musicians was the creative faculty awakened so early, or made its way with such irresistible power as in Franz Schubert." According to his brother Ferdinand, little Franz's first composition was a fantasia for four hands, written in 1810 when he was about thirteen, but Kreissle states that he had before this composed songs, piano-pieces and string-quartets.

We have some delightful glimpses of his childhood, notably a letter written to his brother Ferdinand in 1812, and in every page of whose book the sweetness, generosity and integrity of the musician's soul stand out as gloriously as his genius. In person he was an ugly little man, pale and short; his friends gave him "the atrociously vulgar nick-name of Schwammerl." "Kanevas," was another sobriquet, earned by his asking of every new acquaintance mentioned by his friends "Kann er was?"—"Can he do anything?" He had his moments of merri-ment, in spite of care, and at such times used to delight in singing his own ballad "The Erl-King" through a toothcomb to the uproarious laughter of his friends.

Schubert died in 1828, and was laid to rest near Beethoven. On the memorial stone the original epitaph ran thus:

"Music has here entombed a rich treasure
But still fairer hopes Franz Schubert lies here.
Born Jan. 31, 1797.
Died Nov. 19, 1828.
Aged 31 years."

"Schubert," says Dr. Hugo Riemann, "was the real creator of the modern 'Lied.' His importance in the history of music is analogous to that of Goethe as lyricist in the history of poetry." In Liszt's opinion he was "le musicien le plus poète qui fut jamais." For this reason perhaps Beethoven's appreciation of his friend is also ours. Others may have our mind in these days of intellectual progress, but Franz Schubert has something greater still—Franz has our soul.

CORRESPONDENCE

"THE FLUTE OF PAN"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It is not my custom to reply to anonymous abuse unless it contains some misrepresentation of facts. The verdict given after the special performance of The Flute of Pan was eminently favourable, and thousands of letters were received—from educated writers—in protest against the curious treatment it received on its first production. I have also a number of letters from the most distinguished professional critics of life, and of the modern English stage, and of modern English literature—all of whom offered me the highest possible encouragement. Your reviewer is at liberty to have his own opinion of my work, but I am not bound to regard it as infallible.

We must protest against Mrs. Craigie's characterisation of the review as abusive.—ED.]

SCIENCE AND ART

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Having been treated with such courteous consideration by you and by Dr. Saleeby, I am emboldened to add another word to the discussion.

Broadly speaking, there is but little antagonism between our views; only, as usual, they are taken from different points. On my part I am anxious to get at that narrow marrow of the question which, as an artist, I may be able to hold as something intimate and influencing, and which may be handled and probed by my confrères. Dr. Saleeby, on his part, allows the subject to widen out into the poetic vagueness of elegant but attenuated metaphysics. Spread over extensive generalisations, he naturally finds his "many important questions"; but of these, some are too far removed from the artist actually at work to be directly obligatory, and others are already part of his creed of art for art's sake (e.g., sincerity). From none of them does he dissent. The one question upon which dissent is made is the "separate" one of motive in work, because this has an immediate and direct bearing.

Dr. Saleeby is content to have bridged my gulf between art and morals by a mere rocket-line—happiness. He concludes his syllogism after premising, on authority, that happiness and morality are related, and that the true work of art, being the expression of "the artist's pleasurable emotion," will excite happiness. Well, it may do so or not. Granting that horror is excited, the syllogism fails. On art for art's sake lines a picture of drowning human creatures in an angry hopeless sea, or of the death agonies of a man in the maw and clutches of a monster, may indeed produce some pleasurable emotion in a critical person who sees the work to be well done. Here, then, we converge. The fact of the picture being well done constitutes its claim to be "true" art, the artist himself being entirely irresponsible for the sible ultimate "bearing upon the problem of existence," etc., that such unhappy subjects may have such a bearing.

Although, as he says, we may not persuade Dr. Saleeby that people might be persuaded that whether Wagner or Shakespeare or Watts could be proved to have cared a straw for questions or not, their art per se would have remained the same, artists are actors. They first assume their part and then Shakespeare undoubtedly advanced the sinful plots of his plays, as he followed the saintly devotion of Keats. As to his morals above the average, particularly in the latter part of his life?

Permit me to quote Dr. Saleeby once more. He says: "For art's sake, concerned with nothing but the recording of what has seen, or what his inward ear has heard, may yet, through nothing for that, influence the moral of thousands." Each need then to bind up art with morality or with anything else, a frail thread of "happiness"? Let the artist work for art's sake, as a lark sings—because he must. With such singleness of purpose will be stronger, purer and truer than if it is disintegrated and broken down by such motives as have been claimed for the time mentioned; and being purer, it will prove a greater benefit to the world's economy. Dr. Saleeby himself confirms this in his graph.

Art for art's sake is in itself a morality so ascetic, so exacting, refining, that even almsgiving after a half-crown concert is a comparison sheer sentimentality.

F.C.H.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I intervene in the interesting discussion in THE ACADEMY by repeating Pilate's question, "What is truth?" Ought we to recognise that it is a juggling with words to talk as if one were exactly like another? Is the Law of Evolution, for instance, in the same sense as the Law of Gravitation? or the science of geology as the science of geology? or the maxim, "Summum jus est injuria," as the axiom, "Two parallel straight lines cannot enclose space"? or the assertion, "Nelson is the greatest of admirals," as the assertion, "Paul of Tarsus is the noblest spirit that has graced the annals of humanity"? Let us apply this to the domain of art. Is Shakespeare's Othello artistically true in the same sense as Andromeda, Frogs? or George Eliot's "Silas Marner" as Milton's "Lycidas"? or Turner's Fighting Temeraire as Watts' Hope? In like manner is not a wide difference between moral truth and artistic truth? Do not move on wholly different planes? And is it not a mere trick to prove that there is a necessary connection between them? May not the moralist be no artist, like Kant, and the artist no moralist, like Phidias? If any of your correspondents care to discuss "dry light" on these questions, I shall be grateful.

"MUCKERS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—As a comment on Mr. James Truslow Adams' letter of issue of May 13, I would like to say that the word "mucker" has acquired rather a special meaning among Harvard undergraduates. Offensive, I think (though the term is always discourteous), more than its significance in New York. While a Harvard student some years ago I heard the word constantly applied to the children of times to large boys, and perhaps girls, of the less sophisticated about Cambridge—something like "townies," in fact. Probably in Cambridge chiefly that Professor Münsterberg has been called "muckers."

deck, and while Mr. Amery tells us that "Buller was but the embodiment of the qualities and defects which the British military system tended to produce," we read in the daily papers of a great shortage of officers. Now that this volume is published there must be many officers complaining that a great book is a great evil; but the magnitude of the lesson enforced by it with so much literary skill certainly justifies the editorial severity. Mr. Lionel James contributes a very clear account of French's operations in front of Colesberg, and two most interesting chapters on Ladysmith. Mr. Bron Herbert's share is the story of the Natal operations, described in the preface as "perhaps the most difficult and contentious portion of the whole book:" the description does not exaggerate as the reader may gather from a short quotation. "Spion Kop," says Mr. Herbert, "might have been held against all comers by 500 men, but not by five hundred ordinary British soldiers, nor by 5000. Nevertheless, in face of an enemy so weak in numbers, so undisciplined and so unorganised as the Boers, the tactical deficiencies of the British soldier need have proved no bar to victory in the hands of leaders capable of making the best of his many good qualities, and of compensating for his defects by bold strategy and skilful tactical handling." That is a lesson which Hamley tried many years ago to teach when he wrote his great work to show that "a leader, in order to achieve the most notable successes, need not be gifted with inspiration, but only with the more appreciable, though still rare, combination of sound sense, clear insight, and resolution." The excellent illustrations and the clear maps, based in some instances on special surveys, provide a feature in this volume to which no caviller can take objection, be he politician, soldier or hero-worshipper.

The Religion of a Gentleman. By Charles F. Dole. (H. R. Allenson, 3s. 6d.)—This book is an attempt to provide an ethical religion for the benefit of young Americans who are not satisfied with the Christianity of the churches. It succeeds in propounding a high ideal of life which is convincing and desirable; it fails in giving us any help towards the attainment of the higher life. The writer has all the optimism of the transcendentalists; he accepts the universe. His secret is "to carry the thought of a good God and a divine universe" into the turmoil of life. But he has nothing new to tell us of the way in which the thought may be reconciled with the apparently adverse facts of experience. We are hardly satisfied with the theory that evil is mere imperfection, or a lesser good. The book is frankly concerned with the life that now is; "we want a religion for men, not for 'spirits,'" though spirit, later on, is used apparently as a synonym for the unseen forces of nature. From this point of view the chapter headed "Memento Mori" is disappointing, since it ignores the real sting of death, which is the cutting short of work and thought on this side the grave, and regards it merely as one form of the universal element of sorrow. The chapter on "The Great Renunciation" is perhaps the best. Mr. Dole's heroes are many. "The peasant prophet of Galilee" is favoured with a high place in the ranks of those who have exhibited in life the religion of a gentleman, and the name of Elizabeth Frye (sic) occurs more than once in the same galaxy.

Mr. Frederic Jessel has compiled a Bibliography of works in English on Playing Cards and Gaming, which has been published by Messrs. Longman (12s. 6d.). Gaming in this sense includes dominoes, conjuring, card-tricks and so forth. Mr. Jessel has described the title of every work he has found, however slight, on cards or gaming; and he has included all books which contain allusions of sufficient importance to be recorded, even works of fiction which depend on gaming for their plots or contain scenes which illustrate the mode of playing some particular game. Periodicals have not been forgotten, though Mr. Jessel has found it impossible to include newspapers. The bibliography is in alphabetical order of the names of authors, but the index at the end enables subjects to be searched for without difficulty.

At a time when the question of the admission of alien Jews into England has entered into the sphere of practical politics, a book such as The Return of the Jews to England, by H. S. Q. Henriques (Macmillan, 8s. 6d. net), which gives a succinct account of the legal position of the English Jew from before the Conquest down to the Places of Religious Public Worship Act of 1855 possesses an especial interest. It is instructive to note that even so far back as the reign of Edward the Confessor there were Jews in England who lived "under the liege protection and guardianship of the King," to whom both themselves and their chattels belonged. Increasing largely in numbers after the Conquest, they still continued to enjoy the protection of the monarch, for whom they constituted an important source of revenue. Their resources, however, were greatly crippled by the statute de Judaismo, passed in 1275, which forbade them to exact usury; and in 1290 they were expelled, not to return until the seventeenth century, when their legal position was of peculiar interest. Quid members of the Jewish race there was nothing to prevent them dwelling in England, the edict of expulsion applying only to the actual Jews who left England in the thirteenth century; but quid non-protestants they would necessarily come under the scope of the Law of Uniformity passed in Elizabeth's reign, which made churchgoing compulsory under pain of heavy fines. It is, however, with the question of the Resettlement that we come to the most interesting part of the book. For reasons which we find on the whole to be sufficient, Mr. Henriques opposes Mr. Lucien Wolf's theory, which holds that the Jews were readmitted in 1658 by a Tolerance of the Lord Protector, obtained by the efforts of Manasseh ben Israel. Nothing more was done by Cromwell than to connive unofficially at the residence in London of some half-dozen families. But the leaders of the community had transferred their attention from Cromwell to Charles II., and in return for the advanced in 1656 obtained a promise of assistance, which was subsequently fulfilled. No Acts of Parliament were passed in favour of the Jews, but a series of royal dispensations, culminating eventually in the Order of Council issued on November 13, 1685, in the reign of James II., effectually prevented their enemies from setting in motion against the existing legal machinery. It was not until 1846 that the Jews acquired a permanent and definite legal status by the Act of Her Majesty's Subjects from certain Penalties and Disabilities on Account of Religious Opinions. Mr. Henriques writes clearly and temperately and is to be congratulated on having contributed a most interesting chapter to the history of English law.

Carthusian Memories, by William Haig Brown, LL.D. (Longmans, 5s.)—Between supper-time (did we call it supper or tea?) and bedtime, all the eleven houses of Charterhouse school Godwin solemnly in "banco;" a strenuous time of preparation for the "school." In "Saunders" (the Doctor's house) Dr. Haig Brown himself, gravely presiding, sometimes wiled away a "banco" day, it seems, in surreptitiously scribbling verses. So we learn from Haig Brown's introductory allusion. What joy to have discovered one's headmaster penning some spirited school club song over his blotting-pad, or struggling, while describing a football game with the technical subtleties of "footer" phraseology, or in a mood, turning the adventures of the hapless young lady of the into Latin! "Non recito quidquam nisi amicis, idque contra" is the motto that precedes this little collection of manuscripts found in papers connected with the more serious labours of a busy life. The earliest of them is dated 1855, the last and not the least, 1894. They are only published now under persuasion, but we feel sure that Haig Brown's confidence in their cordial reception among Carthusians is thoroughly justified, were it only for the charm of their sensitive appeal. There is in all these sets of verses, whether they be occasional pieces, school songs and hymns, or "prologues" and "epilogues," a warmth of heart and an affection (which, whether one ever doubted) for the school over which he reigned for twenty-four years, together with a quiet sense of fun which may pass unperceived the duller spirits among the school generations in their turn. Perhaps the following, "On the new Column for the School," as terse, historic, neat, humorous and, despite the little blots, the final rhyme, generally pleasing as anything in the book. The column, it should be explained, had been "embraced" by thirteen with results that considerably surprised him. And so—

"The column, which supports this dial-plate,
Replaced a pillar of an earlier date—
That fell: an infant giant clasped it round
And toppled it in fragments to the ground.
The babe, who Samson's deed would emulate,
By lucky leap avoided Samson's fate
And fled away unscathed, but sore dismayed
At the vast ruin which his hands had made."

The scholar peeps out from many an experiment with trousers from and into Latin, Greek, French and German, and Dr. Brown handles his English rhythms with the skill to be expected of one familiar with many metres. A rendering of Victor Hugo's "A Une Jeune Fille" deals with a theme well suited to one's tenderness towards children touches with peculiar grace many of the little pieces addressed to his younger acquaintance. Of the six written for the four rival school clubs ("Nomads," "Snails," "Cygnets" and "Harpies"), all are equally spirited and ingenious. In acknowledging this we pay a tribute to the author's breadth of view. For was he not always, as behoved him, a keen "Snail" partisan?

The Italian Poets since Dante, by William Everett (Duckworth, 5s. net), might have been an excellent work of its kind if the author had not wilfully spoiled it. The purpose of the book is to point out to English readers that Italy possesses other men besides Dante who are worthy of study, and to introduce us, by means of short critical and biographical notices accompanied by verse translations, to the poets from Petrarch to Leopardi. Mr. Everett is an enthusiastic lover of Italian poetry, and though by no means a translator like Rossetti, a student like Symonds, he was still qualified to produce a competent volume to Howells' Modern Italian Poets. His attitude towards his subjects is sympathetic, his appreciation is sincere, his criticisms are just and moderate. In places, and especially in the last third of the book, he shows himself to be capable of writing quite good English; it is therefore all the more regrettable that he should have allowed his work to stand disfigured by so many slipshod, loosely constructed, and even absolutely ungrammatical sentences. It is also a pity that he should go out of his way, when discussing the old poets of Italy, to indulge in a good deal of uncritical and curiously spiteful abuse of Chaucer, Wordsworth, Browning, Tennyson, Wagner and Whitman. When we read, almost on the last page of the book, of "the abominable that Pulci and Berni, Tasso and Leopardi should still be called noble when they had lost their money," we are reminded of the absurdity with which the book begins—a Latin dedication to the memory of Vergil, followed modestly by the quotation "Tu se lo mio maestro." For both passages are characteristic of the author, of his frequent failures to distinguish between what is great and what is small.

These volumes are handy in size, moderate in price, well illustrated, and written in a lively spirit. The history of cathedral and city is intelligently set forth and accompanied by a descriptive survey of the building in all its detail. The plans are copious and well selected, and the series bids fair to become an indispensable companion to the cathedral tourist in England."—Times.

They have nothing in common with the almost invariably wretched local guides of small size, and their only competitors in the quality and quantity of their contents are the very expensive and mostly rare works, each of a size that suggests a pocket rather than a coat-pocket. The 'Cathedral Series' are important compilations of history, architecture, and biography, and quite popular enough for such as have any sincere interest in their subjects."—Sketch.

WATERMAN'S IDEAL FOUNTAIN PEN

WHEN YOU ARE TRAVELLING

Do you not find the need of a good Fountain Pen?

When there is no inkstand to your hand—

When the inkstand is clogged with dust and dirt—

When you try the post-office, the hotel, or the boarding-house pen—

These are the times you appreciate a Waterman's Ideal.

It means pen freedom, pen efficiency, pen comfort.

It means an easier day's work, without dipping—without interrupted concentration.

This is the Pen which frees you entirely from the inkstand. You should TRY IT.

WATERMAN'S IDEAL FOUNTAIN PEN —

THE BEGINNING, THE END, AND THE MIDDLE of everything that can be said about Fountain Pens is embodied in Waterman's Ideal. The man who has a Waterman's Ideal goes to his day's work at the desk with the lightest heart. There's a reason—in the Pen, of course.

From 10s. 6d. In Silver and Gold for Presentation. Of Stationers, Jewellers, &c. Dainty Illustrated Booklets on Pens, post free, from L. and C. HARDTMUTH, 12 Golden Lane, London, E.C. Paris: 6 Rue de Hanovre. Milan: Via Bossi, 4.

The "COUNTRY LIFE" LIBRARYRoses for English Gardens.By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL and Mr. E. MAWLEY.
Illustrated with 190 full-page Plates. 12s. 6d. net.

Daily Chronicle.—"All the roses of England, blossoming in a counterfeit summer of black and white, seem to be gathered together into Miss JEKYLL's charming book. The pictures are really pleasant to look at; near or far, a rose photographs quite as well as a beautiful face, and carries with it its own individual look. No one can fail to be captured by Miss JEKYLL's enthusiasm and fine discrimination."

Lilies for English Gardens.

Written and compiled by Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL. 8s. 6d. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"LILIES FOR ENGLISH GARDENS" is a volume in the 'Country Life' Library, and it is almost sufficiently high commendation to say that the look is worth of the journal. Miss JEKYLL's aim has been to write and compile a book on Lilies which shall tell amateurs, in the plainest and simplest possible way, how most easily and successfully to grow the Lily—which, considering its great beauty, is not grown nearly so much as might be expected. We certainly think that in the future there will be less neglect of this flower, for after looking at some of the illustrations (all admirable and admirably produced), there will not be many garden owners who will be content to be Lilyless."

Wall and Water Gardens.

By Miss GERTRUDE JEKYLL, Author of "Wood and Garden."

Containing instructions and hints on the Cultivation of suitable plants on Dry Walls, Rock Walls, in Streams, Marshpools, Lakes, Ponds, Tanks and Water Margins. With 133 full-page illustrations. Large 8vo, 186 pp., Buckram, 12s. 6d. net.

Times.—"WALL AND WATER GARDENS."—He who will consent to follow Miss JEKYLL aright will find that under her guidance the old walls, the stone steps, the rockeries, the ponds or streamlets of his garden will presently blossom with all kinds of flowers undreamed of, and become marvels of varied foliage. More than a hundred photographs help to enforce Miss JEKYLL's admirable lessons."

The Century Book of Gardening.

(SECOND EDITION)

Edited by E. T. COOK. A comprehensive Work for every Lover of the Garden. 624 pages, with about 600 illustrations. 21s. net.

Times.—"No department of gardening is neglected, and the illustrations of famous and beautiful gardens and of the many winsome achievements of the gardener's art are so numerous and attractive as to make the veriest cockney yearn to turn gardener."

Gardening for Beginners.

(THIRD EDITION)

A Handbook to the Garden. By E. T. COOK. 12s. 6d. net.

So great has been the success of this gardening book for beginners, that a third edition has been called for and is now ready. This work is for those who are about to begin gardening, nothing that will help the beginner over first difficulties being omitted.

About 100 diagrams will explain certain practical operations better than mere descriptions. There are also nearly 200 illustrations, prepared in the best style, of flowers, fruit, vegetable, and trees and shrubs.

Spectator.—"Full of information about both the useful and the ornamental, and as far as we have been able to test it, eminently practical. The beginner, by the way, will have gone a long way before he has assimilated the contents of this stout volume of nearly five hundred pages; but then alia alius cura, and the wider the choice that is offered by a volume of this kind the better."

Trees and Shrubs for English Gardens.

By E. T. COOK, Editor of "The Garden." 12s. 6d. net.

Gardener's Chronicle.—"A good book on trees and shrubs is a real want. Few books are more often inquired for, and until now we have had a difficulty in replying to our correspondents who have asked for information on the point. In these days of trashy gardening books it is a pleasure to come across one which bears the stamp of original observation, judicious inference, and industrious research."

THE LITERARY WEEK

OUR article on the success in after life of Senior and other Wranglers suggests a similar examination of the names to be found high up in the Cambridge Classical Tripos lists. We have no space to analyse the lists at the same length; but it is worth while to run through them, and pick out the more famous names. The most notable of the Senior Classics have been:

- 1827. Benjamin Hall Kennedy.
- 1830. Christopher Wordsworth, Bishop of Lincoln.
- 1831. Charles Rann Kennedy.
- 1832. Professor Lushington.
- 1835. Lord Lyttleton.
- 1842. Lord Denman.
- 1844. Sir Henry Maine.
- 1845. A. H. Holden, compiler of "Foliorum Silvulæ."
- 1849. Canon Elwyn, Master of the Charterhouse.
- 1850. E. H. Perowne, the theological scholar.
- 1851. Bishop Lightfoot.
- 1853. Roby of the Latin Grammar.
- 1855. Dr. Butler, the present Master of Trinity.
- 1861. Dr. Edwin Abbott, Headmaster of City of London School.
- 1862. Sir Richard Jebb.
- 1864. Dr. Moss, Headmaster of Shrewsbury.
- 1867. John Edwin Sandys, Public Orator at Cambridge.
- 1868. Mr. Justice Kennedy.
- 1873. Professor Butcher, the translator of the Iliad.
- 1874. Mr. Walter Leaf, translator of the Odyssey, and a Director of the London and Westminster Bank.
- 1877. Dr. Welldon, formerly Bishop of Calcutta.

Eminent Second Classics, during the same period, have been:

- 1831. George Augustus Selwyn, Bishop of New Zealand.
- 1832. Richard Shilleto, the famous scholar.
- 1834. John William Donaldson, author of "The Theatre of the Greeks."
- 1835. Dean Vaughan.
- 1842. H. A. J. Munroe, Editor of Lucretius.
- 1844. W. G. Clark, founder of the "Journal of Philology."
- 1851. J. B. Mayor.
- 1856. Charles Stuart Calverley.
- 1857. Sir John Seeley.
- 1861. Sir George Trevelyan.
- 1863. Mr. Arthur Sidgwick.
- 1864. F. W. H. Myers.
- 1867. Sir Frederick Pollock.
- 1873. Mr. T. E. Page, Editor of Horace.

On the whole it is with the Classical as with the Mathematical Tripos. The Seniors have acquired fame in somewhat greater proportion than the Seconds. The notable Thirds have been:

- 1825. W. M. Praed.
- 1841. Lord Thring.
- 1844. Albert Henry Wratislaw, the Czech scholar.
- 1848. J. E. B. Mayor.
- 1861. Cornish, Vice-Provost of Eton.
- 1862. Henry Jackson, co-author with Sir Richard Jebb of "Translations."
- 1867. Mr. Sidney Colvin.
- 1874. Dr. A. W. Verrall.

The Fourths also make a good show:

- 1830. Dean Merivale.
- 1832. Thompson, Master of Trinity.
- 1848. P. Frost, Editor of Thucydides.
- 1850. Professor Westlake.
- 1854. Dean Farrar.
- 1863. Austen Leigh, Provost of King's.
- 1876. Mr. G. C. Macaulay.
- 1879. Dean Armitage.

We will follow the lists no further except to remark that Mr. Gerald Balfour was Fifth Classic, that Archbishop Benson and Sir William Harcourt were both Eighth Classics, and that Charles Kingsley was Ninth Classic. On the whole, it will be seen, that more great men "go out" in Classics than in Mathematics; which is what one would expect, seeing that the study is more humane, and touches life at more points.

Our note last week on translating "La vie est brève" has brought us any number of new renderings. One we print in our Correspondence; the rest only go to prove how difficult it is to make a good English version of a poem so exceedingly simple in appearance. Probably the five hundred translations in the Journal of Education are not a tenth part of those that have been made in the last five years. An equally popular and equally difficult task is the Englishing of "Animula, vagula, blandula"—but in saying this we are not inviting our readers to send us the renderings which each one is sure to have in his mind or his bureau.

It is just one hundred years since there died—most fittingly at Bath—one Christopher Anstey, poet, whose celebrity during his life-time was in direct ratio to his posthumous neglect. When his death was still recent and men had yet an exaggerated idea of his importance, a monument to his memory was admitted within the honourable limits of Poet's Corner, and three years after his death his son—also a poet—honoured his memory by publishing a collection of his "Poetical Works." To-day those works are almost wholly neglected, his name being only associated in the minds of most readers who know anything of him with but one work and that is "The New Bath Guide, or Memoirs of the B—r—d [Blunderhead] Family; in a Series of Poetical Epistles." Of those who know the title of "The New Bath Guide" from contemporary allusions there are probably comparatively few who have read it. This book of what Gray termed "a new and original kind of humour," was first published at Cambridge in 1766. It was instantly successful; Dodsley gave Anstey £200 for the copyright, and eleven years later, having made more money out of it than out of any other book that he had published, he presented it back to the author—a worthy and gentlemanly act on the part of the footman-publisher-poet.

"The New Bath Guide" is marked by an ease of versification from which both Moore and "Ingoldsby" learned something; it is also marked by some coarsenesses which were admissible in a work of the kind a century and a half ago but which have long since ceased to be allowed even to the satiric poet. The book is now mainly interesting as having helped to inspire a more notable one. Smollett's "Humphrey Clinker" owed so much to Anstey's verses, so far as characters and situations are concerned, that it has been described as "The New Bath Guide in Prose." Sir Walter Scott, however, has pointed out that in admitting this we must not belittle Smollett, for

"Anstey's diverting satire was but a slight sketch compared to the finished and elaborate manner in which Smollett has, in the first place, identified his characters and then fitted them with language, sentiments and powers of observation in exact correspondence with their talents, temper, condition and disposition."

Anstey might have been prophetic when in the second edition of his "Guide" he made a lady ask

"Dost think that such stuff as thou writ'st upon Tabbey Will procure thee a busto in Westminster Abbey?"

A correspondent makes two points against our article on Senior Wranglers. The first is that we did not recognise the Maxwell of Trinity, who was Second Wrangler in 1854, as Professor James Clerk-Maxwell. This is a true charge, and we can only say that the Cambridge University Calendar, with its paucity of footnotes and omission of Christian names and initials, lays pitfalls of this kind into which it is very difficult not to fall. We are sorry; but we also wish that the Calendar were more helpfully edited. The second point is that we stated wrongly that Adams, the astronomer, "discovered Uranus." This, of course, was a slip of the pen. What the astronomer did, as all schoolboys know, was to discover Neptune, inferring the existence of that new planet from the observed divergences of the planet Uranus, not otherwise to be accounted for.

Another historic inn on sale is the Hoop Inn at Cambridge, but it is no longer celebrated as it was in 1787, when Wordsworth, then a freshman, saw it from the coach that had brought him from York. Perhaps it really owes its fame to one line in "The Prelude," where the poet describes how he, "on a dreamy morning," first beheld

"The long-roofed chapel of King's College lift
Turrets and pinnacles in answering files
Extended high above a dusky grove.

Onward we drove beneath the castle; caught
While crossing Magdalene Bridge, a glimpse of Cam:
And at the Hoop alighted, famous inn."

The hotel dates back to the reign of George II., and was once known as "The Bell."

It appears that the laurels of Mrs. Stannard and Mr. George R. Sims did not suffer Signor Gabriele d'Annunzio to sleep. He has not indeed invented a hair restorer—whether because he feared the "unfair competition" of the English authors, or because he felt that the "triumph of death" upon his own high forehead was already too well assured—but he has concocted instead a fragrant essence for the perfuming of the bath. The temptation is strong to say that one sometimes feels the need of a perfumed bath after the perusal of his unexpurgated works; but it must be resisted. It is more interesting and profitable to note how authors of the most artistic reputation are beginning to make terms with the spirit of the commercial age in which they live. The example having been set, imitations of it will suggest themselves to everybody. Mr. F. T. Bullen might very well give his name to a new saline draught, and Mr. Hornung his to a new set of burgling tools. To Mr. J. M. Barrie we shall look for a new go-cart or other toy for children. From Mr. C. B. Fry we could accept a new combination of oils for the use of athletes. Photographs suggest that the Hall Caine hat might be as striking a feature of our civilisation as was once the Byron collar; and if noble sentiments from the author's works were printed on the lining, our heads might derive a double benefit from our headgear, and the proprietor of the design a double protection from the laws relating to trade marks and to copyright.

A new departure is being taken by The World's Work and Play in its July number by the admission of an illustrated serial story, "The Education of an Artist." The author is Mr. C. Lewis Hind, and this "practical romance"—for it is essentially practical—is the result of a tour he has made of the principal art galleries at home and on the Continent. In the opening chapters the hero goes to Cornwall, and also decides to visit Paris; and the object of Mr. Hind's work is to show the development of his education. Thus the story is expected to bear a message to those who, like its hero, have not until late in life realised that through what has been to them a closed late lay wide fields of delight and pastures new.

It is greatly to be deplored that all the treasures Europe seem to be making their way to America. The largest part of the library of the late Michael Benary Berlin, about nine thousand volumes, has been purchased by a rich Chicago merchant and presented to the university of that city. It will be remembered that the libraries of the historians, Leopold von Ranke and Curtius, and the scientist Dubois-Reymond were also sold out of Germany.

Yet we are bound to admire the public-spiritedness with which wealthy Americans aid the cause of learning. Mr. Schiff has left a sum of £20,000 to the University of Harvard, Cambridge, Mass., in order that for five years a research expedition may be sent to Palestine. An anonymous donor has presented £40,000 to the University of Chicago to be invested, and the interest expended on the development of the section of the studies dealing with the ethics of the social question.

Controversy still rages in France over the question whether there shall or shall not be a monument to Stendhal. What is interesting to remark is that the first such a memorial was first brought home to the French by an English admirer of the author. A Cambridge professor, it is said, coming to Paris a few years ago with an introduction to the late Stephane Mallarmé, asked to be directed to Stendhal's statue, in order that he might pay a pilgrimage thereto, and had to be informed that there was none. The story goes on to say that he expressed disgust by returning to England by the next boat.

Perhaps the story is not true—at all events in the details: but the fact remains that, though Stendhal is enthusiastically admired by a coterie, the French public in general knows little about him and cares less. The "general desire" to erect a monument, which is mentioned by Dr. Oscar Levy in the appeal we publish to-day in our Correspondence, is a general desire among men of letters and philosophers. The ignorance and indifference of the public was demonstrated not very long ago when a French journal—M. Jean de Mitty—copied out an unpublished fragment since published in volume form with the title "Un jour à Brescia," at the Grenoble library, and offered it to one of the leading literary organs. It was the dead end of the editor was away for his holiday and the assistant editor was short of copy. Consequently the piece was not printed; but when the editor returned there was a disturbance in the office. "You've been making a mess of things," he exclaimed, "printing all this rubbish. Who in thunder is this M. Stendhal who has been written for us? I will not have you accept outside contributions from unknown men."

The French Academy has been distributing more of its literary prizes which are so conspicuously lacking in English literary life. Among others, M. Ernest Daudet, the younger brother of Alphonse, is to be congratulated on having acquired a windfall of £360 for his "Histoire de l'émigration pendant la Révolution française."

Some further reminiscences of Alfred de Musset are destined soon to see the light, from a somewhat unexpected quarter. His aged housekeeper and nurse, now ninety years of age, is about to publish her recollections of the poet. Mademoiselle Adèle Colin entered on her new charge at a somewhat critical period in the poet's history. The family had just been broken up owing to the marriage of a sister, and for the first time in his existence he faced himself face to face with the necessity of earning his daily bread. His health, too, was bad. Paul de Musset, in his biography of the poet, praises the zeal and intelligence of the new nurse, who remained at her post till Alfred's death, seven years later, in 1857.

THE most objectionable. In a sense, we think, but why the correspondents sifted so as to leave are the most pregnant the name of "Confessions." Mr. Henry Frowde is adding two more volumes to his Oxford editions of standard English works—the "Tales from Shakespeare," by Charles and Mary Lamb, with "Don't let's talk of literature"; yet, as far as one may judge from his letters, his conversation consisted of little else. Scott, on the contrary, who made no such profession but rather paraded—if that is not too strong a word for his modest nature—his love of literature, really avoids the topic.

In a well-known passage Mr. Ruskin once expressed an almost unbounded admiration for the letter-writing of Lord Byron, but he gave as an example, to prove his point, what was really nothing more nor less than a piece of rhetoric. We can understand very well how it appealed to the author of "Modern Painters" who never mastered a simple, natural style such as we see exemplified in the works of a Sterne or a Charles Lamb. But the illustration vitiated his praise of Byron as a letter-writer. There are one or two reasons for deposing Lord Byron from the place assigned him by the superficial. He was a poseur, and Mr. Bettany admits this in his introduction. At least, that is how we read his reference to "that taint of the histrionic spirit—the natural birthright, be it remembered, of a man of aristocratic race and temper—that taint, with its accompanying love of emulation and of mystifying." Why "aristocratic race and temper" should have for its natural birthright a taste for histrionics is by no means evident. On the contrary, one would think that these are the heritages that would enable a man to dispense altogether with consideration for the opinion of his contemporaries and beget the opposite qualities of arrogance and pride. In the second place, Byron was in the truest sense of the word an out-and-out egoist. He lived his own life and passed like a meteor through his own splendid and lurid career, but he had not that power of self-effacement which renders Sir Walter Scott or Shakespeare able to enter into and live the life of another. Nothing could exemplify this more strikingly than the opinions which Byron formed of his contemporaries, in which he shows an utter inability to appreciate what is antagonistic to his spirit, showing none of that catholicity which Voltaire preached and which the best of our writers have invariably practised.

It is useless at this time of day to dwell at length on this unpleasant part of his character, but the man who could write thus of Keats has amply earned what we have said about him:

"Of the praises of that little dirty blackguard Keates in the Edinburgh, I shall observe, as Johnson did when Sheridan the actor got a pension: 'What! has he got a pension? Then it is time that I should give up mine.' Nobody could be prouder of the praises of the Edinburgh than I was, or more alive to their censure, as I showed in E[nglish] B[ar]ds and S[cotch] R[ev]ueurs. At present all the men they have ever praised are degraded by that insane article. Why don't they review and praise 'Solomon's Guide to Health'? it is better sense and as much poetry as Johnny Keates."

He praised some of his contemporaries, notably Sir Walter Scott and Leigh Hunt, as much as he censured others, but praise and blame alike were wanting in insight and judgment. And unluckily for himself he had comparatively few interests outside those that were literary. Even his politics did not constitute a master passion, noble as was the friendship he showed for Greece. Perhaps the finest passages in his letters are those that refer to his early life and reminiscences. What could be finer or more tender than his memory of Mary Duff?

"I recollect all we said to each other, all our caresses, her features, my restlessness, sleeplessness, my tormenting my mother's maid to write for me to her, which she at last did, to quiet me. Poor Nancy thought I was wild, and, as I could not write for myself, became my secretary. I remember, too, our walks, and the happiness of sitting by Mary, in the children's apartment, at their house not far from the Plain-stanes at Aberdeen, while her lesser sister Helen played with the doll, and we sat gravely making love, in our way."

But a comparison between the letters of Byron and those, for example, of Thomas Gray shows a difference between one with the natural gift and another whose writing was all more or less forced. The letters do not gain much by being cut into little bits and arranged as they are in the volume before us. They present no consecutive story, but a snippet here and a snippet there which only tend to confuse and puzzle the reader. We can imagine that any one wishing to read an exhaustive creative criticism of the genius and temperament of Lord Byron might possibly have begun by analysing the letters in the style adopted by Mr. Bettany, so that in working out his own conception of the poet he could have been helped by those passages which had a distinct bearing on the characteristic of which he was writing. But Mr. Bettany's volume is only a piece of book-making—simple and simple, and has very little claim to be dignified by the title of a scientific analysis of the correspondence. In addition to all which, it ought to be added that a man whose character is most truly written in the works he has written behind him. If we cannot find it there we shall certainly seek in vain among letters he has written to his friends.

LIFE IN LONDON

Real Life in London; or, the Rambles and Adventures of Tallyho, Esq. and his Cousin, the Hon. Tom Dashiell, in the Metropolis. By AN AMATEUR. (Methuen, two vols. 7s. net.)

THERE were few books of the nineteenth century which had so immediate a success and made so direct an appeal to the town as Pierce Egan's "Life in London." Let us leave Hawthorn, Corinthian Tom, and Bob Logic to their immortality. They will go down the ages to posterity smiling and preposterous. The vast popularity, which they conquered, may seem a trifle strange to our prosaic age, but it is undeniable, and we believe that they will remain unto the end of time the real friends of youth. But to enjoy their adventures in the right spirit you must confront them early. Thackeray, who knew the London of another day as well as any one, returned to the master piece of Pierce Egan with a certain sadness. Bob Logic does not appear quite so knowing, Tom was not quite so keen a Corinthian to the eyes of serious middle life. However, for good or bad, the book had an immense influence, and it showed the way to Dickens when he sat down to write that masterpiece of the road, "The Pickwick Papers." And the influence of "Life in London" was immediate and it was great. Imitations sprang up on every side, and all the imitations by far the best was "Real Life in London." So good was it, that it was instantly assimilated to Pierce Egan himself, and the publisher of the present reprint boldly puts Pierce Egan's name on the back of the books. What warrant he has for this ascription we do not know, but the book is so loyal to Egan's tradition, that if Pierce Egan did not write it, it must surely have been composed by another man of the same name.

For in all respects it reproduces the virtues and vices of the master. Its author never uses a simple word when he can find a complicated phrase to serve his turn. For him wine is always "the Rosy God," and the eyes are seldom anything less than "visual orbs." Moreover there is no word of slang which he does not understand, and he is as fine an adept of the Prize Ring as the author of "Boxiana" himself. And he fails precisely where Pierce Egan fails. He is ever arousing your expectations and not satisfying it. He begins a hundred excellent stories, and just where the interest begins he whisks you off to see a fire or some other dull and respectable sight. But you forgive him all his faults with the best humour in the world. For he has written a genuine chapter of social history; he has left us a vivid picture of the London of a hundred years ago.

And what an enchanting city it must have been, a paradise of irresponsible gaiety. It is no wonder that Bob Tallyho readily responded to the invitation of the Hon. Tom Dashiell and left the seclusion of Belville Hall to study the life of the metropolis. "They order these things better in London," said the Hon. Tom, and Bob was wise enough to believe him. For the London of 1820 was not the drab city of

y. There was colour in the life and the costume of the place. There were yellow coaches and blue coats in the park, there was bear-baiting in Tothill Fields, and there was the Prize Ring to attract the sportsman and to show what British pluck might achieve. For the book was written in the golden age of "The Fancy," when Spring was the arbiter of the Ring, and when Jack Randall, the Nonpareil, was still invincible. Indeed, the description of the fight between Martin and Randall is good as any page in "Boxiana," and is in itself a big piece of evidence that Pierce Egan is the author of the book:

"Randall," says he, "fibbed away with the solid weight of the hammer of a tuck-mill. His aim was principally at the neck, where a blow told with horrible violence."

Here the right note is struck, and the end of the fight is described in the proper spirit:

"His eyes were now turned to Martin," thus the historian proceeds—"being lifted on Spring's knee, in a second discovered that he was dead. His head fell back lifeless, and all the efforts of Spring to keep him afloat were in vain. Water was thrown on him in abundance, but without effect; he was, in fact, completely senseless; and the half-hour having transpired, the Nonpareil was hailed the victor."

Happy Nonpareil! Not only did he emerge from the fight without a scratch, while poor Martin "lay like a lump of unleavened dough," but he has been celebrated in prose and verse by the great masters. Hazlitt has paid him the lofty tribute of his respect, and John Milton Reynolds, the friend of Keats, has celebrated his prowess in an imperishable sonnet:

"Randall—Jack—Irish parents—age unknown,

Here shall you find a loftier compliment paid to courage? And Jack Randall, the Nonpareil, deserved every word of praise which his ingenuous admirers have dedicated to him. Wherever you turn in "Real Life in London" you discover admirable passages of description. What can be better than the picture of the Saloon at Drury Lane, thronged with beautiful Cyprians and careless Bucks? What more picturesque than the sketch of Bow Street, where all the world patters the flash, and shows how easy a mastery it possesses of pedlar's French? Of course the English is overabundant and inaccurate. Egan and his school got their facts at any cost, and they cared not how recklessly they handled the lingo that had come down to them from the Ward and Tom Brown. And, as they took their style from the coffee-house wits, who preceded them, so they handed it on to the smart hacks of the free-and-easy, who followed them. Sala is the legitimate heir of Pierce Egan, and Sala is the only begetter of every picturesque, unbridled reporter, who tramps up and down Fleet Street day-day. So that, if we get no amusement out of "Real Life in London," it would still be worth our reading, because it illustrates a curious, and not unimportant chapter in the history of English letters.

And when we compare the London of to-day with the London of a hundred years ago, we can hardly recognise the ancient town. If Bob Tallyho came to town in this year of grace, how desperately he would be bored! He would find nothing at the theatres save foolish melodrama and unspeakable "musical comedies." He would find no charleys to box, and very few prigs to sneak his wiper. By the way he would not carry a wiper; for the white hemstitched handkerchief has no right to bear the name given to the noble blue bird's-eye of 1820. If he visited Drury Lane he could but bemoan the decay of the once brilliant Saloon. In truth, "Real Life in London" describes the metropolis at its zenith. The end of the Regency saw the dwindling of London as the capital of the world's amusement. The gaiety, of course, did not die instantly. Chief Baron Nicholson did his best to save the forties from boredom, and the Coal Hole and Cyder Cellars survived the glories of Judge and Jury. And even in the sixties there were still Kate Hamilton's and Cremorne.

There was still the Marquis's night-houses as on the Egan might have recognised the Marquis. Though Egan's best to keep the old traditions of the ancient game was play city which has forgotten fast becoming merely official respectability is calculable. The modern ancient Londoner sung in of the bear-baiting and memories. But we are making it we have lost and courage. So it is that "Real Life in London" genuine regret that the more.

ecstasy; he sees an ideal perfection, while he also sees imperfections everywhere. But he has never seen for himself the beauty of these things, or he cannot communicate his vision. He has not joy or ecstasy, and he is plaintive at our lack of it. He does not see fairies; he merely knows that they must exist. He sits disconsolate among believers in one or another imperfect thing, believing only in himself. He is calling out from the housetops to happier uncontented men, to come out and be sad, like himself, in thinking of supreme happiness. Looking up and down time and space, he finds nothing to please him truly, except the ghost of a Chestertonian man flitting here and there; in all his pages, there is no proof that he likes anything but his dreams. He praises an abstract Chestertonian man of whom he is hopelessly and continually in pursuit. That everything he recommends is right, we indeed believe; but he cries in the wilderness, and with no human voice, no trace of suffering or experience at all, but only of an anchorite's imagining. His ingenuity develops now into childishness, often into archangelic sense, never into humanity; except in some of his ephemeral work—e.g. his splendid defamation of the Yellow Press—we seem to be listening to the words of a gramophone that is tortured by the knowledge that it is not a man and yet tries to persuade us that it is a man. As he says of Mr Shaw, in this book:

"He has always had a secret world that has withered all the things of this world. He has all the time been silently comparing humanity with something that was not human. . . . Now, to have this inner and merciless standard may be a very good thing, or a very bad one, it may be a very bad one, it may be excellent or unfortunate, but it is not seeing things as they are. . . . It is the fact that every instant of conscious life is an unimaginable prodigy. It is the fact that every face in the street has the incredible unexpectedness of a fairy tale. The thing which prevents a man from realising this is not any clear-sightedness or experience, it is simply a habit of pedantic and fastidious comparisons between one thing and another. . . ."

It is small matter for wonder, therefore, that his quest has made him sad. It has always been mistaken for a quest of things as they are and as such applauded. But it is a quest for a Chestertonian planet, and one that cannot end

"Ere I have thanked my God for all the grass."

Some day he will have his true reward and gain the place that awaits him among the other men of wit and sorrow in our age.

RUSSIAN LITERATURE

Ideals and Realities in Russian Literature. By PRINCE KROPOTKIN. (Duckworth, 7s. 6d. net.)

Maxim Gorki. By HANS OSTWALD. Translated by FRANCES A. WELBY. Illustrated Cameos of Literature. (Heinemann, 1s. 6d. net.)

PRINCE KROPOTKIN, while sketching the history of Russian literature generally, has concentrated his attention upon the modern authors. This was wise, for they are at once the greatest and the most interesting to an English public. Russian literature, in fact, has no literary past worth speaking of. We have not to consider, in speaking of it, the influences of Greece and Rome and the Renaissance. No one except the antiquary need trouble to go much further back than the time of the French encyclopædists, by whose writings the great Catherine was impressed. They and the private tutors from Switzerland were the great educators of Russia; and she learnt from them only what the Slav temperament was capable of learning. They set their mark far more on academic than on artistic Russia. The poets and novelists—the interpreters, that is to say—could acquire little from them beyond mechanical skill in the use of literary tools. Their genius was quite different; so was the life which they had to interpret; so were the conditions in which they were condemned to interpret it.

It really needed a Russian to write adequately on this subject, for the simple reasons that in Russia literature is more directly related to life than in any other country—that only a Russian can really know the life to which it is thus linked. There is very little question there of art's sake. That is a pose which belongs to the decadent art, and in Russia art is still young. Russian art, then, is far more a means than an end—a means, so that literature is concerned, of protest, and of getting at certain things which otherwise would remain hidden. Even when the Russian writer begins with the aspect of the artist, he ends with those of the preacher. The leading case is, of course, that of Tolstoy, who has gone so far as to reproach himself for devoting so many precious hours of his youth which would have been occupied in preaching; and even he may be said to have preached unconsciously before he began to do so with deliberate intent. Tchekoff, who was at one time the Russian Guy de Maupassant, drifted into preaching almost before he knew what he was doing. Gorki, a preacher from the first, though for a long time he was more than one opinion as to the meaning of his sermons. Russia, in fact, is the land of the novel with a purpose, though the purpose is seldom so easy to detect as in those of "Bleak House" and "It's Never Too Late to Mend"—first because it is intentionally wrapped in obscure language, and second because it is a purpose of wider and grander scope than the purposes of English novelists, and rarely descends in the same way to details.

The difference is partly a difference of temperament—the nature of the Slav to dream more vaguely than the Western European. It is also, however, and notably, a difference of political environment. In Western Europe, artists and men of letters have always been expected to have ideals, even when the particular expression of particular ideals has been discountenanced by a despotic Government. In Russia, official objection seems to be taken to ideals generally. If it were not that the principle of the Russian Government is said to be "whatever has not been expressly permitted by law is forbidden," we should picture the streets and steps studiously with notice boards bearing the warnings: "Ideals strictly prohibited," and "Idealists will be prosecuted to the utmost rigour of the law." At any rate, idealism appears to be regarded, in Russia, as partaking of the nature of sedition; and we shall get a reasonable idea of the average Russian writer if we picture him as liable to prosecution for idealism—and seldom with impunity. It may, if his case is leniently viewed, merely be sentenced as it were under a First Offenders Act, to leave the country and live in the heart of the country, as French writers sometimes were in the dark days prior to the Revolution. That was the comparatively easy fate of Turgenev and Pushkin. But worse may very well befall him. He may be sent to join a regiment as a private soldier. He may be locked up in Schlüsselburg or Peter-Paul. He may be sent to Siberia like Korolenko, and he may be flogged when he gets there, like Dostoevsky. Comparison of security is only for those who write nursery rhymes or one-hand, or dictionaries on the other. Confining himself to these genres, a writer may avoid ideals, and the suspicions which attach to them. But the poets and the novelists feel the need of them—and feel it more strongly because of the prohibition. Constrained to express their thoughts they nevertheless mask them by the use of a sort of hieroglyphic symbolism. Only Tolstoy speaks right out: his Government not daring to apply to him any worse penalty than excommunication—to the ignominy of which he is indifferent. The rest, except those who, like Prince Kropotkin himself, are out of the reach of the clutches of the Third Section, can only express their meaning by subtle hints and cabalistic signs. They must be, so to say, decoded before they can be understood.

We have to thank Prince Kropotkin for decoding some of them for us. Notably we have to thank him for ing the difference between Gorky and Tchekoff, the of the younger generation whose names are most known. Their criticisms of life run, up to a point, parallel lines. They both see Russia—as Turgenieff them saw it—as a stagnant pool of filth which it no means easy to clarify by stirring it up with a long But Tchekoff threw up the sponge in despair, very like that hero of Turgenieff's who blew his brains because he could not "simplify" himself. The world too banal; the intellectuals were too feeble and too the artists, as it seemed to him, could do no more than er their feebleness and their failures. He had, that say, the Slav fatalism; and it was further coloured ne fact that, while he wrote, he was slowly dying of mption. Gorky, having fought his way up from rty to a comparative prosperity, remains a fighter

He knows the Tchekoff and Turgenieff type well gh—he could not help knowing it, for it abounds in sia; but he writes of it only to cover it with angry n. "What's all this talk about circumstances?" he es one of his characters say. "Every one makes his circumstances! I see all sorts of men—but the ng ones—where are they? There are fewer and fewer le men." So Gorky goes about seeking his strong man persistently as Diogenes went about seeking his honest man. He does not find him among the "intellectuals," these too easily become, like Tchekoff, "the prisoners life." But he does find the germ of the type among tramps with whom he has lived; that is why he so en takes a tramp for his hero. The tramp, at least, has root of the matter in him. He cares for nobody, and does not complain. His is the right spirit if only there nt with it "a well-founded, clear thought, embracing the phenomena of life." That is what Gorky seeks. Oh," he cries, "for a man, firm and loving, with a burn- g heart and a powerful all-embracing mind. In the uffy atmosphere of shameful silence, his prophetic words ould resound like an alarm-bell, and perhaps the mean uls of the living dead would shiver." As yet, he admits, e can neither see such a man, nor become such a man himself. But he holds the ideal before him—insists again nd again upon the "necessity of something better than everyday life, something that shall elevate the soul"—and e struggles towards the light. His trouble is always the ame:

"I see many intelligent men around me, but few noble ones, and hose few are broken and suffering souls; the better the man, the cleaner and the more honest his soul, the less energy he has; the more he suffers and the harder is his life. . . . But although they suffer so much from feeling the want of something better, they have not the force to create it."

But he does not despair; he goes on fighting. That is the note of Gorky—never to despair, but always to go on idealising, and fighting and striving for the ideal. It is thus that he is differentiated from all the smaller men; and it is in a really brilliant critical appreciation that Prince Kropotkin has defined and illustrated his distinguishing characteristic.

Practically the same view of the author is taken in Herr Ostwald's essay, though there is more insistence there on Gorky's artistic defects, and on the sentimental extravagances which, every now and again, vary and impair the realistic impressions. The series to which the essay belongs is in a convenient format and promises to be of exceptional interest.

AUTANT EN EMPORTE LY VENS

Borgia. A Period Play. (Bullen, 3s. 6d. net.)

THIS volume is preceded by a design drawn, it seems to us, as only Mr. C. S. Ricketts could do it, representing the Borgia hand trying to arrest the winged wheel of Fortune. It is rather a history than a play that we have here. In proportion as history lives, perhaps it necessarily draws near to drama, and that a large number of this crowd of scenes vindicate their dramatic form by their life will read them and doubt. Why should we at disparage it as "long"? It is what it is, its lei its inequality and its anonymity, may quite a: accepted with gratitude for the life they brii grumbled at or censured. Life is unequal, an nature both long and anonymous. "There is no name" except comfort for those who fancy th: thing is named it is known. The source of all tr is hidden. If it be poetry to us, its source is pa selves. It is not enough for a work to be written: it must also be received as poetry, if it is to l style by right. A public as well as an author is j every success, every failure.

As perfidious as chance, as cruel as destiny, as n as life, as beautiful as youth was Cæsar Borgia, is why a poet should tell his story, a poet who has of an abounding eloquence. A young Cardinal first appears, he receives a sword that Messer F mounted and enamelled for him. He holds i erect and kisses the motto: "Cum numine Cesari

"The Lord Cardinal's Sword,
The Legate's Sword! I laugh . . .
The names they call me, when I have one name
Hot at the core of fixedness, my heart.
O antique Cæsar, conqueror and fount
Of empire, thou wert made my saint at birth;
Thou art my spirit and my augury,
Thy laurels guard me and thy eagles' wings.
My eyes are on thee and thou lead'st my dream
My . . . thanks
To you, good Messer Ercole, for strength
And nobleness of handiwork, the craft
That has subverted matter, as the god
Turned chaos to a fabric. Ah, and the work,
Your work is done, signed of your fame and do
You are most happy. Mine is all an absence
As yet, a future! But the pledge is mine—
This sword, your creature, and my prophecy."

Of such quality is the abounding eloquence v jures for us the vision of that wild young m brilliant gifts forced Machiavelli almost to hop success might have redeemed his crimes. "autant en emporte ly vens," as much as tha takes away. He deceived himself even more f: he deceived the Condottieri at Sinigaglia. To from scene to scene is to feel "there's a di shapes our ends, rough-hew them how we will, divinity whom the old Pope, his weak father, b or hoped to cajole, or trembled at, but the fac love of good is the only source of huma Alexander VI. is more wonderfully presented th sensual, affectionate, humorous, cowardly, react lavish imaginative hopefulness from every blow fitting ruin. Hark, how he speaks of his eldest the younger has mysteriously made away with:

"He is not breathing with me any more,
And yet I cannot bid you pray for him;
I do not count him dead. He is but lost,
And lost so deep I do not think a creature,
Not even his Creator knows the place
That he has wandered to. The lost must wan
They have no goal, not even hell, no rest.
They have their freedom as the unbaptized
To rove in horror where none plucks the sleep
Or questions them or bids good-day.
They wander on till they are fitting ghosts,
Till they are elemental and dissolved,
And when they would entreat us, they must r:
In the howling wind about our chimney-stack
So I encounter my Giovanni—so!
So I was tutored of the storm last night
He is not breathing with us any more!"

Such is the old Pope in one of his many moo him is the beautiful Lucrezia, not that mor Medea of legend and Victor Hugo, but a Luc whole plan of life is smiles and silence. She sa so much that did condemn her love, she dared c it in her smiles, excuse it by her silence. After death (a splendid scene) we see her feeding a cloud of doves:

"In my dreams . . . he came to me,
His lips bulged out for kisses: 'Dance, Lucrece, Dance to me child; it is that grace prevails;'"

she says; and so we think of her, settled all over with doves, though henceforth she must add to smiles and silence more and more of prayers. Our chief quotations are from prelude scenes; they are samples of a power which expands into scenes that must be read whole, if the eloquence they contain is to find us. Having followed Cesare to his death, we reached "the rough-hewn gorge" "at Viana in Navarre."

"He lay there, naked
His face under the sky. . . .
The great wind swept him and the sun rose up."

THE EDUCATIONAL FERMENT

School Teaching and School Reform. A Course of four Lectures on School Curricula and Methods delivered to Secondary Teachers and Teachers in Training at Birmingham during February 1905, by Sir OLIVER LODGE, Principal of Birmingham University. (Williams & Norgate, 3s.)

It is the age of educational unrest. A sort of Grand Inquisition is going on in the minds of the thoughtful at the present time. Time-honoured curricula and methods are everywhere arraigned: Some indeed stand already condemned. New panaceas and nostrums abound. The upshot is still doubtful, but one thing is certain. The present spirit of inquiry is leading people to a discussion of the deep underlying causes which give meaning and reality to education. We are getting beyond the stage when it was thought that a smattering of Technical Instruction or a homœopathic dose of Greek was enough to save the country. We are beginning to see that the vital questions are the position of the School in the social system, the type or rather types of individuals it proposes to turn out, and the organisation and teaching requisite to give effect to these general aims. Among the growing number of those who are voluntarily offering their evidence on the subject at the bar of public opinion is the Principal of the new Birmingham University, Sir Oliver Lodge. If he disclaims acquaintance with the inner mysteries of secondary education, he shows by his obiter dicta that he has many of the qualifications of the born teacher. He has in addition two excellent qualities: he does not ride a theory to death and he can see that there are two sides to every question. How few there are who recognise that in education, probably more than in any other art, there are always materials for a minority report!

What renders this book a little difficult to criticise is its lack of proportion, or rather of completeness. Unless we assume that the citizenship Sir Oliver Lodge preaches in his last chapter is meant to be the kernel of his message, we seem to miss a centralising theme. His book is a suite of sound or brilliant aperçus, rather than a series of interdependent doctrines. The effect may possibly be intentional, as the author at the outset repudiates the dogmatic spirit. Yet he himself must know that the synthetic which we desiderate is by no means the same as the doctrinaire.

On one or two points we feel compelled to break a lance with Sir Oliver. He thinks that languages should be "picked up" colloquially as fast as possible; "an inkling" should be obtained at once, and "a polish of various grades" should be put on later. The great majority of the authorities on modern language teaching—not the fossils but the progressives—are dead against this method of acquiring a good deal at the start, and eliminating mistakes afterwards. They are nearly all agreed that in language teaching festina lente is the motto, since it is far more difficult to unlearn than to learn. No doubt the proper way in learning most subjects is to pick up as many facts as one can and then deduce theories from them; but in modern languages, unless one is completely at home from one's countrymen in a foreign land, one picks up their mistakes, which means that one picks up one's wrong, a danger which does not exist to any extent in history or science.

Let us turn to one or two of the numerous points on which we feel inclined to cry encore to Sir Oliver. We commend his plea for a variety of stages in teaching the same subject, each representing a complete aim, yet scoping into the stage above to make a still higher aim. Thus in Greek, the first stage is a knowledge of the language which is useful even to the mathematical student; the second stage helps us to puzzle out a phrase by means of a dictionary; the third stage enables us to read an easy passage; at the fourth, classical authors may be read with pleasure; at the fifth and beyond, the learner becomes a scholar, the true sense of the word. If teachers would keep these stages in mind, how much more satisfactory the education of the average boy would be! At present he is treated as though he were a potential senior classic.

We entirely endorse Sir Oliver Lodge's arguments for more leisure in our public schools. The sound theory of keeping boys out of mischief by keeping them occupied has been put to the most pestilential uses. The result is abnormally long hours in school and compulsory work that end in general "staleness." We all want to prevent loafing, but how much better to cut down the tale of hours in class-rooms and on cricket-field, and offer the boy a chance of self-development in either the school library or the workshops that every big school should possess. The problem of the future in our schools is less work and more varied recreations. The compulsory corvées often leave no trace on the after-life of the pupil, but his hobbies die with him. We have yet to solve the question of how to make the transition from compulsory work to the work for its own sake. In the same way we must have more art in our schools if we are to have more art in our lives. At present our big towns think they have done all that is necessary for art when they have built a Museum. They might just as well open a Zoological Garden, and imagine they have established a cult of Nature. The average householder who lives, maybe, in a beautiful home, turns his latchkey on his artistic senses as soon as he steps into the street.

We cannot forbear quoting one or two happy phrases, the first a delicate piece of irony:

"The fully inflected ancient languages are the best and most satisfactory [for any one desiring a liberal education]; if they were more complete and regular like 'Esperanto' they would be better to begin with."

"Avoidance of the cane was the only motive for learning in the few dreary years; everything was worked on the principle of repulsion instead of attraction."

"The only thing that many schools are thoroughly successful in teaching is inattention."

TRAFALGAR

The Year of Trafalgar. By HENRY NEWBOLT. (Murray, 5s. net.)

For a monograph on Nelson's greatest and final exploit it would be difficult to suggest a better hand than Mr. Newbolt's. The author of "Admirals All" and of "The Island Race" stands marked out for such a task: it is by right: he has proved his title. Should any enterprising publisher project a series—the Lives of Famous Admirals, let us call it—no critic could quarrel with the appointment of Mr. Newbolt as editor in chief. He has a sentiment for our gallant captains: he seems to have caught a touch of that fire and heat of admiration which their names and exploits kindled in the breast of R. L. Stevenson. This is well, for when a man is in love with his subject he is already more than half-way to success. The trouble is, that in his present book the author appears erately to have cramped his enthusiasm. It is there, doubt: it is possible occasionally to detect it beneath the surface; but the general effect produced is more dry, less and dispirited than we have a right to expect. For all, verse is perhaps the vehicle proper to these heroic deeds, not plain prose; and assuredly we prefer the sound and lilt of Mr. Newbolt's lyrics to this pedestrian prose. We gather that he feels something of this himself. Compelled to prose, he has culled an anthology of verse wherewith to decorate his final pages. "The Arms of Trafalgar" is his title for the chapter. A century ago the poetry of this country was only moderate in quality, which is possibly the reason why we fought so long. The hypothesis is sound enough, that a period of peace and stress fertilises the literary soil. The artist waits when the struggle is past: there is no room for him to display his wares while we are still at hand-grips with a national crisis. Thus Mr. Newbolt's own songs impress us more than the frigid rhetoric of the Right Hon. George Trevelyan or the patriotic sentiment of the Right Hon. W. Croker.

To put it baldly, this volume is a piece of book-making. It is not to say that it is unreadable or, indeed, uninteresting. Book-making is not necessarily a crime: if the work is well done the results are often extremely valuable, and the work here is performed as conscientiously as could be wished. It is plain that Mr. Newbolt has not spared himself or trouble to get at the facts, and his chapter on the "Tactics of Trafalgar" will no doubt be useful to future students. Had the book come from another hand it should have called it praiseworthy, and made an end. Coming from Mr. Newbolt it affects us with a sort of disappointment: we had looked for more than this disposition on tactics, this arid catalogue of ships and their commanders. But it is perhaps unjust to blame an author for the elimination of his own personality. He has set himself the task of condensing into a small compass the evidence relating to the battle, and his modest aim is rather to send the reader back to the best authorities than to supersede any of the books already in existence. We receive, in consequence, a treatise rather than a life-like picture, with a chastened gratitude in place of the warmer appreciation we could wish to express. For we cannot but feel that an author so happily selected could have informed his pages with that touch of humanity which turns a tepid interest into enthusiasm. As things stand, there is one touch of life, and one only, in the book—a quotation from a letter written to his mother from a boy of twelve on board H.M.S. L'Aimable.

WHY RUSSIA IS POOR

The Russian Peasantry. By G. STEPNIAK. (Routledge, New Edition. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. ROUTLEDGE has chosen a good moment for producing a new edition of Stepniak's vivid and enlightening book. Except that the evils have increased, few things have changed in the ten years which have passed since it was written. The only development has consisted in an immense spread of poverty among the working classes, a vast growth of chronic misery, a more rapid return to recurrent famine. Most English people have a vague idea that this is all the result of tyranny; but they have no clear conception of the economic causes. How is it that a rich agricultural country, by no means over-populated, lies in this trough of poverty? Why is it that in Russia alone among European nations the mortality among the peasants is greater than among the townspeople, and greater in Central Russia than in the remotest steppes? How is it, above all, that the Emancipation Act of Alexander II., instead of bettering the condition of the Russian peasantry during the last generation, has made matters worse?

The answer to all these questions will be found in this book. Stepniak was no mean economist, and he put his finger surely on the weak points in the Russian social structure. He saw that the Emancipation Act contained the seeds of its own undoing. It made the serfs free men. But it gave them so little land that their freedom has been of very little use to them. Unable to live on their own produce, they have been obliged to serve as hired labourers for their old masters. In many cases they have been compelled to sell themselves, literally, as bought labourers to usurers. Serfdom has been creeping back through a hundred loop-holes—serfdom without the old sense of responsibility, and without the old sentimental tie between master and man.

Meanwhile, a worse evil has arisen. It is the ambition of modern Russia to become a great exporter of corn, and it is the policy of the Government to encourage the big exporters by paper money and railway grants to collect the corn all over the country in the autumn. But the plain fact is that Russia does not produce enough corn to feed her own people, and the result is that the rate of Russian mortality is going up by leaps and bounds, and the land, badly cultivated and over-worked, is getting poorer every day.

We have before us in the present state of Russia the latest development of the evils which Stepniak so clearly sketched out. What is the true remedy? Stepniak agreed with Tolstoy in thinking that the chief remedy lay in the redistribution of the land. In order to make them free men the peasants must be made peasant proprietors. That is the only way to bring them prosperity and Russia health. But it was part of Stepniak's fundamental creed that this change could not be brought about by the Russian Government as it is constituted. The autocratic bureaucracy must go. There must be a development of self-governing powers—such a development, let us hope, as we see in the present Zemstvo movement.

This sketch of Stepniak's political and social point of view by no means exhausts the interests of the book. He knew the Russian peasantry as has no other man save Tolstoy. His sketches of "Hard Times," "Popular Religion," and the "Mascot," have the same qualities of close, photographic observation and vital human sympathy as Tolstoy's best work. The crowning pity of it all is that a system of government should be capable of driving men such as Stepniak into murderous protest and barren exile.

THE LITERARY PREFACE

The Plays of Sheridan: The Critic, The Rivals, The School for Scandal. With an Introduction to each Play by EDMUND GOSSE. (Heinemann, 6d. net each.)

MR. HEINEMANN'S "Favourite Classics" are very dainty little books: the paper is better than in other recent pocket reprints we could name, and he does not commit the error of giving too many pages to a volume. A single play of Sheridan is all one ever cares to carry about in the pocket (if the much-talked about habit of carrying books about in the pocket be a veritable custom and not an imagined one), and we would rather have the legible type and the decent margins of these slim volumes than more of our Sheridan for the money. We are surprised, however, that Mr. Heinemann should not only adhere to the bad habit of disfiguring with an ugly stamp the title-pages of the "presentation copies" he submits to critics for the favour of their good opinion, but should also permit his complimentary slip to be pasted in the book between the title-page and the tissue before the portrait in such a manner as to take away with it portions of both these leaves, however carefully it is removed.

A few pages of introductory matter by Mr. Edmund Gosse are obtruded between the reader and Sheridan. We had hoped that that hardy perennial, the "literary" preface, had passed away with other useless lumber, but it survives; like Mercurialis perennis, it reappears again and again to the confusion (and amusement) of those who thought it had been eradicated. For of what use is it? We have no quarrel with Mr. Gosse: it is against this trick of "introductions" that we are venturing a tilt. Except for a few typical sentences Mr. Gosse's pages are, comparatively speaking, harmless; they contain biographical and theatrical data which can be found in the ordinary books of reference, and the student who wished this information would be better employed in looking it up for himself, when he would have the opportunity of acquiring further useful information and an acquaintance with the methods of inquiry, than in taking these very concentrated tabloids, supposed to be rendered palatable by their surrounding of suggestive jam. If it is the first time a reader sits down to Sheridan he is not allowed to taste that light and dry Amontillado without first imbibing a small Seltzer, effervescent and sparkling, it is true, but, in the result, more truthfully to be described as flatulent than even Miss Hannah More's tragedy. Again, of what use is it? The artless and ingenuous Extension student is beguiled into the study of a master through some one else's spectacles: he is led into imagining that the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth has been perceived of the work in question, some one else's opinions become his, especially if they are "safe" ones, and it is ten to one that he falls a victim to astigmatism. How different from this is the happy fate of the youth left to browse at will in these fresh pastures! If he must have facts other than the work itself they should be those only which will link the play, the poem, the author, on to anything he has read before, set forth without the aid of any fireworks-adjectives to coruscate before his virgin eyes and blur that first sight

"When a new planet swims into his ken."

Uncontaminated and unprejudiced from the first by the intrusion of any one between the "two and two only absolute and luminously self-evident beings," himself and his author, this youth will turn from author to critics with some individual basis to support him, his first-hand knowledge; he will find their writings where he should find them, in volumes of their "causeries"; he will realise, with a start of satisfied delight, that T. has expressed just what he felt when he read that wonderful passage about the "topless towers of Ilium"; he will learn, with a sense of unhappiness, that C. can be blind to a subtle shade. And the result is that he acquires a sense of proportion, the art of finding beauty instead of being directed to it, and the healthy knowledge that the appeal of an author is personal, the appeal of a critic personal only when one is interested in him as a critic, or in an author's personal influence upon him.

A HANDBOOK OF GREEK ART

A Grammar of Greek Art. By PERCY GARDNER, Litt.D. (Macmillan, 7s. 6d.)

DR. GARDNER'S aim in this book is to educate our schools' and also the general public, to perceive the excellence of the art of Greece, and, perceiving, to assimilate something of the Greek spirit of simple beauty and sanity. We can imagine no better antidote to the pettiness of modern life than that the taste, and we may add the character, be moulded by a love of Greek art. The dignity, the discipline, the splendid physical beauty, the perfect balance, of typical Greek art are qualities that the over-wrought modern may indeed desire to possess himself, and to promote in the education of his children. Dr. Gardner's book, though brief, covers a wide range, and is rich in illustration; but we could wish that the beauty of the originals had been better rendered, even at a sacrifice of number. At least one full-page plate, in the finest possible medium of reproduction, should have been selected for the great masterpieces in sculpture, vase painting, and coin design, respectively; the many small cuts would then easily have been recognised as only an index to the beauty of the originals.

We urge this point because it seems to us that Greek art, in finding its right position in English education, may have to combat a general feeling that the subject is dull, unpalatable, formidable; and to dispel this feeling the extraordinary beauty and charm of the finest work should be so indisputably presented as to arrest the eye even of the casual reader. For this purpose one super-excellent plate is worth a dozen rough reproductions.

A most interesting passage in a chapter on the "Formation of Sculptural Types" puts before us the extraordinary beauty of the hitherto little-known portrait-sculpture of the Greeks:

"In turning over the portraits of Greek statesmen, poets, and philosophers, one is fairly amazed at the high level of beauty which they show; here a beauty not merely of outline and physical condition, but of mind and character. These great men seem to belong to a race which has perished. . . . It is a race of kings reminding one of nothing so much as the heroic figures which meet us in the 'Lives' of Plutarch—a book which has perhaps done more to foster manliness than any book ever written."

We cordially endorse every word of our final quotation: the warning it conveys and the standard it upholds cannot be too vigorously enforced:

"In our days . . . the works exhibited at the Royal Academy show that the models accepted by modern sculptors are often of very poor type, ill-nourished and ill-trained. Among a people predominantly urban, and living under unhealthy conditions, the admiration of robust beauty in man or woman is apt to give way to the admiration of what is fashionable and smart. The danger of physical degeneracy hangs low over all the nations of Europe. Our continual competitions, our restless travellings, our reckless sacrifice of all that restrains, in our endeavours to reach certain ends, make a gospel of rhythm and moderation seem to us dull and poor. . . . And yet, as it seems to me, unless the English-speaking races return in some measure to the artistic ideals of Greece they are in the long run doomed."

THE WOODS OF PEACE

SING to me, Beloved, no more of the sadness and sorrows of men,

But a song of shining summer days and the joy of life!

Long are the days of June, and full of sunshine;

Sweet are the roses with hearts of gold,

Yet their petals fall as swift as the gleam

Of the white butterflies in the clover.

Sing to me then of quivering sunshine,

And the burnished gold of the fields,

Of scarlet poppies a-dance in the wind,

And the lark lost in the brilliant blue!

Sing of the great woods, and cool shade,

The green lairs under the bracken where deer lie hid,

Of the world of leaves where the birds dream on in the silence of noon.

Sing the glades dew-silvered under the moon,

Of shadows under the mighty trees, dark as a purple
pansy,

And silence brooding close like a soft-winged bird,—

For there lies the pool of dreams, and there is the well of peace.

Sing to me, my Belovèd, till your singing throbs

Like the heart of a nightingale who sings in the dusk,

And I will follow you over the rocky places,

Through the sharp thorns and the darkness,

Till in all the world is only your voice,

And in the great woods and places of dreams,—peace, peace, peace!

MARGARET DOROTHY ROUTLEDGE.

THE AWAKENING AT OXFORD

MR. CARNEGIE, in a very interesting and sympathetic monograph upon James Watt—the forty-second volume in the Famous Scots series (Edinburgh: Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, 1s. 6d.)—has drawn a fine picture of the life at Glasgow University when Watt was received within its precincts and permitted to start the workshop, “about twenty feet square,” in which the “demon steam” began to haunt him. Among his most intimate friends were Adam Smith, Dr. Black, the inventor of latent heat, Simson, the mathematician, Dr. Dick, his chief benefactor, John Anderson and John Robison. It was an age of great men, and especially of great manual labourers, enthusiastic and unselfish, blessed with poverty and devoted to research work. Things were in the air, experiments, discoveries, improvements; and it is an exciting and romantic story, as recorded by Mr. Carnegie, who traces not only the Watt family, showing the almost natural production of a genius, but also the gradual development of James’ powers, and the various influences which, by helping him at the right moment, or by stimulating him to fresh efforts through temporary disappointments, enabled him to make “science descend from heaven to earth.” Among these influences a large debt is acknowledged to Glasgow, whose “peculiar claim to regard,” says Mr. Carnegie:

“lies in the perfect equality of the various schools, the humanities not neglected, the sciences appreciated, neither accorded precedence. . . . Her ‘atmosphere’ favours and stimulates steady, fruitful work. At all Scottish and American universities, we may rejoice that there is always found a large number of the most distinguished students, who, figuratively speaking, cultivate knowledge upon a little oatmeal, earning money between terms to pay their way. It is highly probable that a greater proportion of these will be heard from in later years than of any other class.”

In acute contrast to this state of things is the position, as popularly imagined, of Oxford at the present time. Oxford is regarded as a lurking-place for all the old delusions and false doctrines of the world, the home of mediæval scholasticism and classical pedantry, throttled by futile efforts to teach philosophy on a religious basis, a slave to Greek grammar, effete, lethargic, moribund; a haunt of river-mists and time-worn fallacies, tolerated by an indolent nation and beloved of American tourists for its venerable antiquity. Progress is a word at which all wise men are supposed to shudder, at Oxford. And if some hare-brained enthusiast asks: “Where are the geniuses, where the research work, the room set apart for James Watt, the welcome given to an unknown mechanic?” he cannot yet be answered satisfactorily. It is not, indeed, easy to see how great men are to be produced in existing conditions at Oxford; all her efforts have so long been centred on the formation of the high mediocre type of man, sound, urbane and estimable—in fact, the good citizen.

But many influences have lately been at work to sift the authorities and traditions and to reorganise the basis of education; the coming of Rhodes Scholars, the question of compulsory Greek, the issues raised by Professor Firth in his inaugural lecture and the answer composed by history tutors have tended to rouse the interest of those who were inactively dissatisfied by the previous system. Much has already been done to improve the classical, historical and scientific schools, and the impetus lately given to the last-named is a valuable proof that reforms are to be conducted upon a really broad basis. The medical school, for instance, gives perhaps the best preliminary scientific training in medicine in England; the work done is thoroughly sound and the teachers are enthusiastic and sincere. A still more encouraging sign is the fact that old Oxford men are beginning to subscribe towards the improvement of branches which in their day were so good as to be worthy of support in their endeavours to become better. This is of enormous value, for moral rather than financial reasons; no better proof of genuine intentions could be shown.

Moreover, the excellence of the tutorial system must not be forgotten; it is liable to abuse and often renders a tutor little better than a coach; but, if properly handled, it gives him a chance to study the inclinations of his pupils, and greatly to assist their development. As a result, Oxford is now turning out men who are really equipped to start on the research-work which must be the object of the intelligent scientist. If this principle had been recognised before—that every man must make it his object in education to become capable of adding something to the world’s knowledge, that research-work in any branch is the real test of a man—then the spirit of freedom, inquiry and broad-minded ambition at Oxford would be no novelty.

But it is too early to be sanguine; there are still many things which must be abolished if a “liberal education” is to be practicable. First and foremost, the incompetent professors must be shelved; nothing worth doing can ever be done so long as apathetic old gentlemen rest on imaginary laurels and persist in the idea that a University professorship is a sinecure. They are like the old man in the fable. “It was so my fathers did in the ancient days; and I have neither a better reason nor a worse.” “In my thought one thing is as good as another; and a shoe of a horse will do.” Their work, such as it is, is done, or rather left undone; they must now give place to men who regard each department in science not as an office where certificates of proficiency are bought, but as a part of a coherent whole, encouraging and developing talent wherever discovered, and forming the complete paideia which the state demands for its younger members.

Secondly, the fallacy of examinations must be finally exposed: it must be understood exactly what a first class connotes. Given intelligence—and without intelligence a mental education is of very little use—any man has it in his power, by sitting in his chair for so many hours a day, and by spending enough money on private coaches, to get a first class. A great many of the best men do get firsts, but it is by chance. Some exceptionally clever scholars have been known to deceive an experienced examiner into a belief that they have read their books; others are so grossly stupid that they cannot persuade the same examiner that they have ever looked at the books which lie on their tables ragged with perennial thumbing. If the state requires men who have, if nothing else, the power of concentration upon whatever is laid under their noses, βοσκημάτων δικην κάτω ἀεὶ βλέποντες, let the class-lists in Final Schools be a passport to office and a certificate of proficiency; if not, let some higher standard be observed, some consideration given to original work; let examination as far as possible be abolished and the “thesis” given a fair trial.

Oxford has so much of value to offer that its delinquencies deserve the more ruthless chastisement. It has a higher standard of general culture than perhaps any other University in the world; in the social intercourse between members of different colleges, in all the amenities of daily life and in the various types of fellow men which it presents for the instruction (not untempered by amusement) of each new-comer, it must take the precedence of even Cambridge. In the Indian Civil Service probably the most valuable effects of an Oxford education are clearly seen; and if the examination were less a repetition of the Oxford system, it would produce an even finer and worthier set of men who have been fostered in a great tradition.

The Golden Age is coming, when prize fellowships will not be used for domestic purposes but devoted to research; when tutors, relieved from a weight of drudgery, will have leisure to give personal help to their promising pupils; when we shall have something more to offer to Rhodes scholars than εὐτραπείλια and can open the gates wide for all those whose talents need but sympathy and encouragement. Thus only can victory be won over the Philistine; thus only can Oxford be called a real University, “where any man can study everything worth studying.”

JOHN LYLY AND THE ENGLISH DRAMA

A CERTAIN John Berkenhout, M.D., commenting upon Lyly in the "Biographia Literaria" (1777) wrote :

" 'Euphues' is a most contemptible piece of affectation and nonsense. From the style of this romance I have no doubt but his dramatic pieces are wretched performances,"

—an unblushing confession that he had not so much as taken the trouble to read what he presumed to condemn. A strong case might be made out, indeed has been made out recently by Mr. R. Warwick Bond in his edition of Lyly's complete works, to prove that "Euphues" was very far from deserving all the obloquy and contempt that has been cast upon it in the last three hundred years. But we are not here concerned with "Euphues," which may fairly be regarded as the first English novel. Our purpose is to look into those dramatic pieces which Dr. Berkenhout convicted without trial, and to see whether there is not something to be said in their favour.

It is necessary first of all to realise in what circumstances they were written, and what was the condition of the English drama about the year 1575. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that the English drama did not then exist at all as a "going concern." The Mysteries, of which we hear first soon after the Norman Conquest, had something of the form but scarcely any of the other qualities of drama, as the term is now understood. They were religious in their subject-matter, and their purpose was to extend the influence of the Church by means of a kind of popular entertainment. The next stage is marked by the Moralities, which did not deal so directly with religion, but were rather allegories leading up through symbolical action and characters to a quasi-religious moral. A further step was taken towards real drama by way of Interludes, short witty dialogues, still turning on topics more or less religious; but the characters in them were more human than in the Moralities, personified virtues and vices giving place to flesh-and-blood men and women—a decided advance. Queen Elizabeth was an active patroness of the infant drama. She encouraged the performance of Latin plays at the Universities and the Royal College of St. Peter at Westminster, and inducements were held out to literary men to write new plays in Latin and English, many of which were acted before the Queen at the Universities and the Inns of Court. The tragedies Gorboduc (1561) and Palamon and Arcite (1566), and the comedies Ralph Roister Doister and Gammer Gurton's Needle are representative of this period. They are not without merit, but they are primitive in manner and terribly ponderous in metre and language.

This very bare outline of the early history of the drama in England is enough at least to show that progress had been slow and that the playwright's art was still crude and undeveloped, when John Lyly left Oxford and came to Court. His "genie being naturally bent to the pleasant paths of poetry," he wrote his first play, The Woman in the Moone, in verse, but in blank verse as a sort of compromise between rhyme and prose. The result was not successful. The effect of this first attempt to write in an unfamiliar style was to make the construction awkward and unreal, and the diction stiff and strained. He did not repeat the experiment; rhyming verse had been tried in Ralph Roister Doister and Gammer Gurton's Needle and had been found wanting: so Lyly resolved to strike out a new line and made the great discovery of his life—prose comedy. It is plainly written with the same ink as "Euphues," but it is euphuism modified to suit the requirements of dialogue: the long periods are gone, the drawn-out similes are cut down in number and dimensions, but puns and metaphors remain and antithesis is overdone. The language is consequently artificial, and for that reason is severely censured by his critics. But if artificial language is so grave a fault in comedy, Lyly at least errs in excellent company, Aristophanes, Shakespeare—and Mr. W. S. Gilbert. Critics and editors seem apt to forget that Aristophanes' and Lyly's plays were written to be acted, not to be read, and that what is condemned as a "bad pun," when it appears in print, is often very amusing on the stage.

The plots of all Lyly's plays, except Mother Bombie, which is an imitation of Terentian comedy, are based upon stories taken from classical history and mythology. But, as Mr. Bond well points out, in no case does he simply take the old story and turn it into dramatic form; not only does he show excellent judgment in his selection, but he displays a true sense of the requirements of the drama by the skill with which he alters and supplements his original. To take a single instance, his Sapho, except for her infatuation for Phao, is totally unlike the Lesbian poetess; a play on the lines of the familiar legend must have been a tragedy, which was not what Lyly wanted; so he made such changes as were necessary for a happier climax and worked his material into a very neat satire on masculine and feminine weaknesses and follies. The dialogue in this play is particularly bright, especially in one scene where the two chief characters argue at cross purposes but to the same end, through a confusion between the words "yew" and "you." His detractors have some reason for urging against him that there is a sameness about most of his characters and that he fails in the art of developing them. But even here he is not so contemptible as he is made out to be. It must be admitted that in Endimion Cynthia, Eumenides, Tellus and the rest all want distinctive personality; though in the underplot Sir Tophas is cleverly drawn and was thought by Shakespeare worthy to contribute largely to the creation of Falstaff, Sir Toby Belch, and Holofernes. And even Collier, who seldom had a good word for Lyly, had to admit that Diogenes and Apelles in Alexander and Campaspe are not wholly contemptible. Again, there is considerable merit in the picture of maiden modesty battling with the boldness inspired by passion in the story of Gallathea and Phillida.

Lyly's plays are all comedies, but they were designed to point a serious moral as well as to amuse, and therein differ from many farces which pass for comedies at the present day; his was serious, not boisterous comedy. But he saw that this style was bound to grow tedious, unless it were alleviated by occasional scenes of pure farce. Thus we often find a piece of mere fooling inserted immediately before or after a passage of dignified tone. In Endimion, for example, there is a highly ridiculous dialogue between Sir Tophas and Epiton followed directly by a most grave but withal charming discussion upon Love and Friendship. This juxtaposition is no doubt quite intentional; a mind so bent on verbal antitheses must have been readily disposed also towards strong contrasts of thought and character.

Criticism of Lyly's plays must be made with due regard to many attendant circumstances. They were "Court" comedies; that is, they were written for the amusement of Elizabeth and for the gratification of her inordinate vanity, a task requiring no little delicacy and tact. They were acted not by companies of professional actors but by choir-boys; and the theatre then did not know the use of mechanical contrivances, which were soon afterwards introduced: so that the variety of action and incident was inevitably limited to a narrow scope. Then, Lyly refused to avail himself of the facile opportunities for wit which are offered by obscenity open or disguised. If he was over-nice on this point, it is at least a creditable defect, and it ought not to count seriously against him, when he is compared with his successors, who gave greater variety and piquancy to their plays by their disregard for decency.

On the whole it may fairly be claimed for him that he left the English drama much more safely established than he found it. When he came upon the scene, it was ill designed and ill constructed. He brought in new materials and strengthened its foundations; he also drew plans for its decoration and suggested how they ought to be carried out. He had not the genius to perfect it himself, nor the opportunity, for he was hampered by his duties as a courtier. The work was promptly taken up at the point where he left it, and in a few years was completed the monumentum aere perennius of the Elizabethan drama.

A LITERARY CAUSERIE

ROBERT BLOOMFIELD

THE fact that the people of Shefford, in Bedfordshire, are erecting a monument to the memory of Robert Bloomfield, recalls a name that has its own special interest in the annals of literature. Bloomfield died in gloom and poverty at Shefford; perhaps it would be more appropriate for the memorial to be in the Suffolk village of Honington, where he was born. The country around Bury St. Edmunds is distinctively the Bloomfield country; it lives in the homely pictures of his verse.

It is not easy to appraise the poet justly. He certainly had no great genius; yet somehow his "Farmer's Boy" lives, though more than a century has passed since its appearance, and proves that there may be vitality in work that is not first-rate. But this work had the merit of absolute faithfulness and sincerity: the poet depicted the life of the farmer's boy, and he was a poor farmer's boy himself; himself a rustic, he painted true rusticity. His is genuine pastoral poetry—no mere exotic borrowed from Theocritus and Vergil, like the puppets of Pope; blended with no religious and Court controversies, like the eclogues of Spenser; it is the daily life of farmyard and village. Thomson himself, though he had set a model, had written of the thing from the outside, adorning it with much fine poetry and some bombast. Bloomfield was less powerful than Crabbe, but quite as truthful: he may almost be said to have anticipated, in verse, some of the prose-pictures of Richard Jefferies. It was the real country life of old England that he told of, in a generation that knew nothing of rail or cycle or motor-car—a rusticity even less sophisticated than that of Cobbett's "Rural Rides."

Hazlitt declared that Bloomfield's genius is "too humble; his muse has something not only rustic, but menial in her aspect." There is no depth of suggestion, no reserve of meaning; his descriptions are the bare realism of country life, accompanied by reflections that are never more than commonplace. It may be urged that this was exactly the vein at which Wordsworth himself deliberately aimed, though Wordsworth's genius often carried him far beyond his ostensible purpose. With Bloomfield there was nothing behind the naked simplicity, no hint of restrained power, nothing to read between the lines. But we must remember that he was a peasant writing for peasants. He became a cobbler, it is true, but the rusticity of his boyish experience always remained with him. He lacked the ambition and the emotional nature of John Clare; he had not the humour of Allan Ramsay. He is just the Giles, the farmer's boy, of his own poem:

"Strange to the world, he wore a bashful look;
The fields his study, nature was his book."

We see him plodding along the ridges after the ponderous harrow:

"His heels deep sinking every step he goes,
Till dirt adhesive loads his clouted shoes."

He rises early, because his duty calls him early afield; he fetches the cows, and helps the dairymaid to milk them, his tattered hat borrowing a coat of hair from their sides as he leans against them. He is shepherd also, and has to see that the sheep are safely folded; he watches the lambs gambolling on the hillocks of thyme; he bends his pliable hat into a telescope, to follow the soaring of the lark. He sees the lusty mowers, "emulous and strong," as they lay the swaths of grass at their feet; and the country maid whom he describes in the hay-field is the very portrait of Dolly in Jefferies' "Field-play." Her future history, perhaps, is the same, but Bloomfield does not tell us of that. He pictures the hooped keg of home-brewed ale that brings refreshment to the tired labourers; he shows us the poor patient horse, with his cruelly docked tail, and the flies worrying the cow till she kicks over the pail of milk. He shows us

"The thundering chase, the yellow fading woods" of autumn; the hogs wandering among the woodlands in search of acorns; the bird-boy scaring the birds from the lately sown wheat, roasting the sloes of the hedges to form his humble feast, and looking in vain for young companions to share them. We see him toiling through the clogging snow to feed the cattle, taking the ivied stump of a tree for a ghost as he hastens timidly down the narrow lane, plucking up his courage with all the philosophy he can muster as he steps

"By churchyard dark, or grove, or fairy-ring."

Each season brings its full supply of the humblest drudgery, yet the boy's heart is content and he has his satisfying pleasures, his gratitude to the "eternal Power" he has been taught to worship. The picture, indeed, is bare, and painted with little art; but it is true.

Equal to "The Farmer's Boy" in their faithfulness are the Suffolk ballads of rustic life which Bloomfield wrote later. He is not quite so successful in the tales that remind one slightly of Crabbe; but these ballads have a touch of the vernacular, and can still waken a warm response in Suffolk hearts. He tells us of the old couple, forty years married, who go to the fair to revive their early memories.

"And Richard then, with heart elate,
As past things rushed across his mind,
Over his shoulder talk'd to Kate,
Who, snug tucked-up, walked slow behind."

"When once a giggling mawther you,
And I a red-faced chubby boy,
Sly tricks you played me not a few,
For mischief was your greatest joy."

He recalls how he used to win the jumping and racing prizes, fifty years since; they see their children and grandchildren enacting the part they themselves once played. The careful Goody brings her husband away from the merry scene betimes, for she knows how a little of the ale "makes him mellow," but not before he has dropped a glad tear over his gathered offspring, and exclaimed:

"May you be all as old as I,
And see your sons to manhood grow;
And many a time before you die
Be just as pleased as I am now."

He sings of the village market-night, of the Fakenham ghost, and of the Horkey, or harvest-supper, when

"All the guests, with Farmer Crouter,
Began to prate of corn;
And we found out they talked the louder
The oftener they passed the horn."

Phrases occur like "mawther," and "sitch a mort of folks," that remind us of our dear friend Dan'l Peggotty. The verses are not, indeed, in the highest rank of poetry, but they must live, for they are literally faithful to a life that has well-nigh passed away, a memory we cannot willingly let die. Bloomfield is racy of the soil, and his limitations are just the limitations of the people he describes. Anything that recalls this good old simple-minded poet to our recollection is a cause for gratitude. It may be late, but it is not too late to raise a memorial to the name of Robert Bloomfield.

FICTION

Tillie: a Mennonite Maid. By HELEN R. MARTIN. (Hodder & Stoughton, 6s.)

THE scene of this story is South-East Pennsylvania and the people are Dutch or German farmers. The men are honest and austere, but inconceivably ignorant and brutal. Their women-folk are mere beasts of burden condemned to work without recompense and suffer without complaint. Their life is one of hideous narrowness and gloom, but from outside a freer air presses in where it can, carrying help to those in bondage. Tillie, the little Mennonite maid, develops like a flower amidst her cruel surroundings, and from the beginning she finds friends to encourage and support her. With all her gentleness she has inherited from her grim father very useful qualities of steadfastness and determination. Her clear intelligence shows her the injustice of his tyranny and the duty she fulfils in opposing it; and though she begins by being the victim of her father's brutality she rejoices you with a firm and spirited resistance that is victorious in the end. None of the characters are overdrawn. We fear that even the father is life-like in his mixture of selfishness, severity and genuine affection. He believes that his wife and children exist for his profit and comfort and any opposition to his views causes him real surprise. His method is as rough and simple as his speech and as the life of the society he ornaments. It is a curious and interesting picture of a remote farming colony, preserving the peasant ways and even the expressions of Dutch ancestors amidst American civilisation. The farmer is a savage of the middle ages; his child is taught at school by a Harvard graduate; a clash of wills in the farm-kitchen naturally results. The doctor who "learnt medicine by practisin' it" is a delightful character. "Lekstures be blowed," he exclaimed when asked where he attended lectures. "Do you suppose you could learn a boy carpenterin' by settin' him down to read books on sawin' boards and a-leksurin' him on drivin' nails?" He tells Miss Margaret that she has encouraged him by letting him sit with his feet on the rounds of her chair. "It's looked to as meanin' gettin' down to biz!" says he, a bit injured because his "allurin' female" is going to marry some one else. The story is told with humour and perception; it describes a quaint corner of the world; and though it deals with narrow lives it never falls into the depressing "realism" that is so untrue to the mingled yarn of human experience. Tillie herself is a charming memory.

A Woman and her Talent. By LOUISE JORDAN MILN. (Blackwood, 6s.)

THERE can be no question about the ability displayed in this book: how much or how little pleasure is to be derived from reading it depends upon the reader. Those who take it up for amusement and distraction of thought will not find it restful; those who shun ugly scenes and painful pictures will hardly persevere to the end. It appeals almost entirely to such readers as love personal details, who like to see how the wheels go round in the domestic machinery in times of storm and stress when a cunning hand keeps those wheels spinning for their entertainment. Now and then they may even gasp a little at an incident, or a phrase, and feel tempted to cry "enough." One of these points will be reached when a boy of eleven thus addresses an adoring, indulgent mother, while the father looks at her with an evil mocking smile. "I'll treat you as I like! Understand?" said Tom. Tom dies at sixteen after an amazing career of vice and extravagance. This is one of the straws that help to break down the general interest. All the pleasant and happy things are to be found in the first part of the novel; Helen's life and friends at Vassar College, her wooing and wedding, two or three instances of fine unselfishness; but these are almost forgotten when we reach the torrent of mud through which the characters are doomed to struggle, not always towards safety or salvation. At Vassar Helen astonishes the professors by her cleverness; they are unanimous in promising her a great future if she will consent to study. Helen, however, decides for the profession of love and marriage, and the angel-faced Bertie Stanard answers to her ideal. The best side of the man is at first uppermost, he is devoted and unselfish, and life goes gaily. Then comes the unlucky day on which he discovers that his wife can not only write his articles on emergency, but that she is a literary genius—and all is changed. Against her will Helen is pushed along the road to fame. She becomes the breadwinner, and Bertie spends and wastes faster than Helen can earn. Rapidly Bertie runs down hill into the gutter, destroying Helen's happiness, ruining their son, wrecking the home, Helen meanwhile attaining a world-wide reputation. All possible enough, true enough, no doubt; but if the author desired to excite sympathy for anybody concerned, she fails signally; there is too much that jars upon and repels kindly feeling. There are quarrels and quarrels, even in fiction; these are too realistic, too sordid, too frequent, and Mrs. Miln's inkpot contains more than the usual proportion of gall. Still, the long tale of Helen's dreams and miseries, with its unpardonably commonplace happy ending, testifies that the author possesses a considerable share of that talent which she claims for her unlucky heroine.

The Poet and the Pierrot. By DOROTHEA DEAKIN. (Chatto and Windus, 3s. 6d.)

THIS is a bright little tale, yet presents nothing new in incident, and is true to life only as it is known in the land of the novelette. The fancy portraits of the two sisters are as old as novel-writing itself; every reader is acquainted with the sedate elder sister who earns the bread and butter, and her young sister, pretty, variable, artfully-artless, and pronounced "not nice" by her feminine neighbours. As in a hundred similar stories, there are lovers (a poet and a pierrot in this case), who allow themselves to be accepted and rejected according to the mood of the moment; there is a dearth of shillings and an un-failing supply of dainty raiment; a number of love-scenes, and a happy ending for every one. It is not a lofty type of story, but it is amusingly told. The author has a light touch, and shows skill in the arrangement of her rather tawdry materials. We doubt whether in "The Poet and the Pierrot" Miss Deakin is seen to advantage; there are indications that she is capable of producing something far better than foolish love-quarrels, and gay chatter about flirtations and pretty frocks.

The Countermine. By ARTHUR WENLOCK. (Alston Rivers, 6s.)

THERE is a lack of ingenuity in the invention of the plot of this novel, which, though the writing is good and the characters consistent, goes far to deprive the story of its interest: for, as the author confesses in his introduction, it is melodramatic, and a melodrama must have a carefully manipulated plot. Here there are no unexpected turns and fine developments; our first surmise as to how the story will end is disappointing in its accuracy. Captain Welford is accused of having stolen the plan of a mine-field, falsely, of course, since he is the hero: but he cannot prove his innocence without disclosing a family secret or dragging a woman's fair name before the public. His sense of honour keeps him silent: his sense of honour is even more strained and absurd than is usual in melodramas, and, though we long to feel enthusiastic over his nobility, we are merely irritated by his stupidity and annoyed that he should be proved innocent and marry the heroine—"sweet brave-hearted Kitty." Mr. Wenlock has illustrated the book himself and his seven illustrations are far better than is the conception of his story.

The Morals of Marcus Ordeyne. By WILLIAM T. LOCKE. (Lane, 6s.)

THERE is a distinction about all Mr. Locke's work, and it is more marked in the present volume than in any other we have read. It would not be possible to improve on his manner of saying what he has to say: it is irreproachable, and no one who has an eye for good phrasing and an ear for the cadence of prose could fail to experience that agreeable thrill of pleasure that these qualities arouse. His style is delightful, pointed, witty and finished. But for all his admirable craftsmanship there is something wanted, and that an essential—vitality. There is a certain aloofness from life, as though the author saw men and women through coloured glasses which hid their precise individuality from him; and we feel his characters are contrasts and ideas rather than living people. In the opening chapters of the novel, "Marcus Ordeyne," this defect is not apparent, for the story is a frank fantasia. Marcus Ordeyne, by the timely death of three relatives, is able to leave the school where he has been an unwilling master, and, free from "Jones minor and the First Book of Euclid," to indulge in seclusion and his literary tastes. Seven years have slipped by since the happy day of his freedom, and on the Embankment he meets a girl of marvellous beauty who has run away from a Turkish harem. The kindness of his heart obliges Sir Marcus to take her to his home: circumstances oblige him to keep her, and she becomes his ward. The position is splendid—the absolutely unsophisticated woman with surprising Eastern ideas of marriage plumped down in the household of a staid literary bachelor who has prim and designing relatives. But unfortunately the fantasia is not allowed to continue. The book takes a wayward turn towards the tragic, and here it is that Mr. Locke's defect is noticeable. He introduces another woman, one Judith, with whom Marcus is in close intellectual sympathy, but to whose passion for himself he is absolutely blind. The machinations of this woman to separate him from Carlotta end in bringing him to the point of suicide; but in order to attain this much of plot Mr. Locke is content to make Judith act in a manner preposterously unreal. A woman of the insight and experience which Judith is stated to possess does not need to have recourse to artifices that would make a schoolgirl blush. The whole episode is forced and quite out of the picture.

The Outlet. By ANDY ADAMS. (Constable, 6s.)

THERE are some novel-readers who prefer that their heroes should be clean. Others prefer heroes who never bathe, who are addicted to whisky and red flannel shirts, and clothe themselves with slang and curses. The latter class of readers will probably be pleased with Mr. Adams' story. He tells us how he, in company with other cowboys, drove an immense herd of cattle from Texas to the Yellowstone, and of the adventures that befell them on the way. These adventures include perils with rival drovers, perils with Indians, and perils with sheriff's officers. The Indians do not seem to have given the cowboys much trouble, but the sheriff is apparently the cowboys' inveterate foe. The humour of the book is provided by the conversations of the cowboys around their camp fires, and the stories which they tell to one another. Some of these are not particularly new, and for the most part their humour depends upon the slang and profanity used by the narrators. The book needs a glossary, if it is to be thoroughly understood by English readers. What, for instance, are we to understand by "a blanket rate"? What is a "horse-wrangler" and what are "culls"? When can a man truthfully be said to be "chesty," and how does one "fog" one's enemy until he looks like "an angel in the clouds"? When Mr. Adams undertakes to write plain English he is not always successful. When he informs us that whole counties have recently been "settled up" we can guess at his meaning, but when he says that "it took less than an hour to cull back and count, excuse the ranch outfit, and start this contingent for the branding pens" we are hopelessly fogged, although we may not look like angels in the clouds. Doubtless the book gives a truthful picture of the life of a cowboy. It may be a strenuous life, but it certainly is not a beautiful life. Mr. Adams' cowboys are drunken, quarrelsome, lawless ruffians, unredeemed by the kindly nature and unconscious humour which make Bret Harte's miners lovable. Mr. Adams might say that his cowboys are true to life, while Harte's miners are impossible. That would be quite true, but the fact would remain that Harte's miners interest us while Mr. Adams' cowboys are simply repulsive.

BOOK SALES

THE sale of the libraries of the late Lt.-Col. Shuldham, Co. Cork, the late Mr. F. A. Inderwick, K.C., and others took place at Messrs. Sotheby's on June 15, 16 and 17.

Col. Shuldham's books included some of Dibdin's bibliographical works and a first edition of White's Selborne.

Amongst Mr. Inderwick's books were Howell and Cobbett's State Trials, Cokayne's Peerage, a set of Notes and Queries (with all the indexes) and a set of the Dictionary of National Biography.

The principal prices obtained were: Madame D'Arblay's Evelina, 3 vols. 1778. First edition. £13 (Ellis). Bulwer-Lytton's Weeds and Wildflowers, 1826. £4 (Ellis). Dickens (Chas.). Oliver Twist, 3 vols. 1838. First edition. £3 5s. (Ellis). Dickens (Chas.). Martin Chuzzlewit, 1844. First edition. £2 16s. (Rimell). Egan's Life in London, 1822. £5 17s. 6d. (Edwards). Surtees (R. S.). Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities, 1843. £13 (Hornstein). Canova's Works in Sculpture and Modelling, 2 vols. 1824. Large paper. £5 5s. (Hornstein). Dibdin's Bibliographical Decameron, 3 vols. 1817. £9 2s. 6d. (Edwards). Dibdin's Tour in France and Germany, 3 vols. 1817. £3 5s. (Hornstein). White's Natural History of Selborne, 1789. First edition. £20 10s. (Hornstein). Burlington Fine Art Club. Exhibition of Bookbindings. Facsimile plates in colours, £7 10s. (Hitchman). Cobbett and Howell's State Trials, £10 (Maggs). Cokayne's Complete Peerage, 8 vols. 1887-98. £25 10s. (Harding). Dictionary of National Biography, 67 vols. 1885-1901. £48 (Edwards). Boys (W.). Collections for a History of Sandwich, 1792. £5 10s. (Rook). Notes and Queries, 105 vols. £22 (Sotheran). Ruskin's Stories of Venice, 3 vols. 1851-3. First edition. £6 10s. Selden Society Publications, 8 vols. £5 10s. (Harding). Kelmiscott Press. Caxton's Godfrey of Bologne, £4 8s. (Maggs). Warner and Williams. The Orchid Album, £8 12s. 6d. (Maggs). Camden Society Publications, 164 vols. £16 (Harding). Scrope's Days and Nights of Salmon Fishing in the Tweed, 1843. £5 7s. 6d. (Hornstein). Fielding's Tom Jones, 6 vols. 1749. First edition. £3 3s. (Hornstein). Meyrick's Ancient Armour, 3 vols. 1824. £6 (Sotheran). Gould's Monograph on Humming Birds, 5 vols. 1850-61. £12 5s. (Edwards). Westmacott's English Spy, 2 vols. 1825-6. £8 5s. (Spencer). Manning and Bray's Antiquities of Surrey, 3 vols. 1804-14. £15 10s. (Sotheran).

The total amount realised was £1218.

THE DRAMA

ON TRANSLATIONS FROM THE FRENCH

MR. HARRY MELVILL'S English version of L'Adversaire, by MM. Capus and Arène, which is now being played at the St. James' under the title, The Man of the Moment, raises certain old questions as to the adaptation of French plays for the English stage and perhaps one or two new ones. If one compares it with another recent adaptation of a work by M. Capus, My Lady of Rosedale (Mr. Comyns Carr's version of La Châtelaine), one feels that some gratitude is owing to Mr. Melvill. At least he has not taken a French play about French people with French ways of thought and standards of conduct and imagined that it could be made into a play about English people merely by altering the characters' names, touching up the dialogue, and transferring the scene to Surrey. The scene of The Man of the Moment is Paris and its immediate neighbourhood, the characters have French names, and the plot follows the original with moderate fidelity. Much of the dialogue is faithfully and competently rendered. So far Mr. Melvill has done well.

And yet the The Man of the Moment is not L'Adversaire. In spite of external resemblances, in spite of identity of plot and character and at times the closest parallelism of dialogue, the plays remain extraordinarily unlike. There is a spiritual difference between them which outweighs all formal resemblances and keeps them hopelessly apart. How far Mr. Melvill is responsible for this we have no means of knowing. Possibly his text was somewhat severely "edited" in rehearsals. We know what enormities the intelligent English manager is capable of in his desire to make modern comedies "play closer." Too often he prevents them from playing at all. Possibly the censor of plays had to be considered, or his equivalent in the dress circle of the St. James' Theatre. Possibly Mr. Melvill is not over well served by his cast. In judging of a play it is notoriously difficult to apportion the blame between actors and acted, and to declare with certainty whether the players strangled the piece or whether the piece choked the players. Probably each and all of these reasons contributed something to the comparative failure of The Man of the Moment considered as an English version of L'Adversaire. Anyhow the result was to give us a play curiously lacking in some of the salient qualities of the original and not in itself of first-rate interest.

Let us see what are the salient qualities of M. Capus' work. It is witty, but its wit is of a rather special kind. His are not the kind of "good things" which you can quote and enjoy apart from their context, which contain some profound truth, some real contribution to thought. His dialogue sparkles but does not enlighten. It is facile, superficial; above all it is reckless. The things that his characters say would make the hair of the respectable playgoer stand on end if he took them seriously. But then M. Capus has such a confident, genial way with him that they never are taken seriously, and the result is a merry evening. Mr. Melvill, however (or the St. James' Theatre), has not trusted to this. He has left out M. Capus' recklessness, toned down his audacities, and lo! the wit has vanished too. It is as if, say, Mrs. Humphry Ward (to select a name of obvious distinction) had been entrusted with the task of preparing a revised version of The Importance of Being Earnest.

Again, M. Capus' plays are plays of atmosphere. There is little or no plot, hardly any incident. Everything depends on the bright, easy dialogue, the sardonic humour, the clever sketches of character. Mr. Melvill (or the St. James' Theatre), again, has not realised this, or perhaps has purposely ignored it. The atmosphere has been toned down where it has not been left out, the characters have been modified in very essential particulars, while all the attention has been concentrated on the plot. The result is a quite interesting and even thrilling third act, but a first act that is superfluous, a second act that is dull and rather incredible, and a fourth act that ends in anti-climax. M. Capus wants to interest us in the Bréautins and their "set"—in the particular phase of contemporary Parisian life which they represent. He considers no time wasted in showing us what kind of people they are. It is bad construction no doubt. No one could defend it. But, such as it is, it is M. Capus'. If you do not like it you must not try to put his plays on the English stage. The St. James' management do not like it. They are shamefaced about it. They shirk it. One suspects them of wanting to "cut the cackle." And M. Capus suffers.

Again, M. Capus is a man with ideas, theories. Even his most frivolous plays have a sort of thesis. He plumes himself on looking at things with a fresh eye, on being something of a social philosopher. He called his play L'Adversaire, and the reference is apparently to the eternal struggle between the man and the woman for predominance. It is not a very remarkable theory or a very original theory, but it is the keynote of the play. Mr. Melvill (or the St. James' Theatre) frankly jettisons M. Capus' amiable theorisings. Duel of the sexes, struggle for mastery, the critic on the hearth, go by the board, and we have the play dubbed The Man of the Moment. Quite a suitable title for a play about a young lady who attached such importance to social or political prominence that when the barrister who loved her suddenly achieved a great success she felt unable to resist his importunities; but is that quite the intention of MM. Capus and Arène's comedy? The same kind of hardy disregard has been shown of the nuances of the characterisation. Darlay, as written by Mr. Melvill and played by Mr. Alexander, is so unlike in essence to the Darlay of the original that his attitude at the end of Act II. is not merely absurd but incredible. Where, save in the melodramas of the Surrey side, does a husband say to his wife—at the top of his voice, too!—"I am your lord and master"? French is a language more patient of rhetoric than ours, but M. Capus would never have been guilty of such a lapse. To adapt Hedda's famous phrase: "People don't say those things."

FINE ART

THE PASTEL SOCIETY

THE SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN TEMPERA

THERE are two exhibitions at present open of pictures wrought by methods which are both in the nature of a revival, that of the Pastel Society at the Royal Institute, and that of the Society of Painters in Tempera at the Carfax Gallery, and they present amusing contrasts. Of course pastel is a medium comparatively recent and has been always in supplementary use from the time of Russell, whilst the revival of tempera, the oldest medium of all, dates from yesterday.

But there appears to be, judging only from these two exhibitions, a greater misunderstanding of the peculiar qualities of the first medium than of the second, which is rather surprising. It may be that a medium which demands above everything a witty summary of the essential aspects appeals less to the national temperament than one which demands chiefly great care and precision.

It may be doubted whether the multiplication of tones which has been achieved by French masters, chiefly Lechestier Barbe and Edouard, in pastel is altogether advantageous. The beginner is misled into thinking it possible to obtain in a single stick of pastel each tone required, but finding very soon that he never can lay his hand on that particular stick, he attempts either to paint in pastels and obtain his tones by rubbing several into each other, or else to obtain them in the more modern method of pointilism. Both of these methods should be very sparingly used, as they destroy the peculiar bloom of the material. Pastel should be what it was from the first—a drawing in coloured chalks arbitrarily selected, involving only an approximation to the true tone and colour. Whistler understood this as he understood every other medium with perfect taste and discretion, and his pastels are models of style. Mr. Fred Mayor and Mr. H. B. Brabazon are the only followers of the Whistler tradition, and their works are excessively slight. On the other hand, there are several artists here who use a harder pastel for the drawing and can obtain a high degree of finish. The most successful in this more conventional style are the portraits by Mrs. Helen Bedford, which have great charm without loss of character. The French have always been brilliant pastellists, and Le Bassin de Bacchus of M. Gaston La Touche, the cynical L'Amante and Dans une Bergère of M. Louis Legrand and the hasty scribbles of the late Eugène Boudin are brilliant if they are nothing else. Mr. Muhrman is occasionally a little heavy handed, considering the slightness of his theme, but in Roses he shows his peculiar sensitiveness to delicate tone.

With these exceptions the exhibition is a very haphazard jumble, and it is evident that two hundred and eighty-nine pastels is much more than any English society is justified in exhibiting.

The Society of Painters in Tempera has wisely chosen a smaller gallery for their first exhibition, and the number of pictures is only eighty. Consequently there is very little work that is positively bad, and a considerable number of excellent pictures. We realise that there is more range in the material than might have been expected. Mrs.

Herringham, who knows all there is to be known as to the tradition of tempera, paints in the traditional hatch and stipple of Botticelli and Cosimo Rosselli. This method is apt to impart a doll-like stiffness to the figures, not without charm but distinctly archaistic and precious. The Twelve Brothers of Mr. Arthur Gaskin, the Atalanta of Mr. John Batten, the Legend of Mrs. Marianne Stokes are charming enfantillages. We can best convey the feeling by calling the first-named a "duck" of a picture.

It is a great pity that the Pre-Raphaelites had not rediscovered tempera. The harshness and rawness of colour in Rossetti, Madox Brown, and Mr. Holman Hunt would have been avoided if they had worked in this medium, in comparison with which oil is intractable, clogged and lumpish.

The fusion of tone which is the easiest part in oil colour is rendered extremely difficult through the rapid drying of tempera. But Mr. Roger Fry, Sir Charles Holroyd, and Mr. Anning Bell, while retaining the characteristics of the medium, have approached oil in this respect. Mr. Adrian Stokes' A Mountain Meadow, Austria, with its foreground of flowers, is a tour de force in the blending of tones, but surely oil or pastel would be the most natural medium in this case. Mr. Cayley Robinson's The Deep Midnight is a queer and clever performance, extremely able, and not a little irritating in its preciousness, like the rest of this artist's work.

If tempera is not oil, neither is it water colour nor gouache; hence the pictures of Mr. Norman Wilkinson, Mr. Maxwell Armfield, Mr. Walter Crane and Mr. Graham Petrie are mistakes in the choice of material. The Blue Lake of Mr. Charles Gere shows entirely the right stuff in its judicious alternation of transparent and solid colours, and the exquisite quality of the blues is shown to perfection. His other landscapes, A Roman Camp and The Cowslip-ball, are extremely sweet and delicate, but might almost as well have been water colour or gouache.

I am inclined to believe that tempera has as great a future before it as it had a past, but as indicated by Mrs. Herringham in the preface to the catalogue. "For a time it was a handmaid to oil painting," but out of sight as it were, for there is no doubt that for a long time "the new method was most frequently little more than finishing scumbles and glazes over tempera or size foundation work." The conviction is growing that the use of tempera as a foundation extended to a much later period than was at first thought. We can only account for the peculiar quality of Canaletto and Claude Vernet on this supposition; and any one who has copied the Christ and Magdalene of Titian in the National Gallery in tempera with glazes of oil must come to the same conclusion about this picture, although the case is different with the later Titians. If somebody who has studied the subject, Mr. Roger Fry for instance, could throw more light on it, he would be doing a service not only to archaeologists but to contemporary artists. As it now stands, tempera painting is merely a curious revival, and the Society of Painters in Tempera a body which is archaistic and decadent in its tendencies. It is rather on the lines of Watts' The Utmost for the Highest, the commencement of a picture in tempera which was to have been finished in oil, that the future of this medium may be expected to lie.

ART SALES

On the third day of the Coates Castle sale a number of pieces of Sèvres were realised good prices. The most important item was an oval-shaped tureen of Bleu de Roi and white Sèvres porcelain, gold ornamented, painted with flowers by H. Prevost, and mounted with fine chiselled ormolu, which sold for £1400. A ewer, with stand of turquoise Bleu de Roi Sèvres porcelain found a purchaser at 735 gs.; a rosewater ewer and cover of white Sèvres rose to £735; and an écuelle in turquoise-blue Sèvres porcelain, with gold ornamentation, painted with birds in cartels, realised £700.

On Friday, 16th inst., Messrs. Christie disposed of mediæval and renaissance works of art, decorative objects and furniture, porcelain, etc., the property of Mr. J. H. Fitzhenry and others. A processional cross by Maso Finiguerra (North Italian, early fifteenth century) realised 460 gs. (Durlacher); another, fifteenth-century Spanish workmanship, 300 gs. (Welsh); a knightly belt, fourteenth-century French work, 210 gs. (Watson); and a set of fourteen Sheraton armchairs, 88 gs. (James).

Messrs. Christie sold on Saturday a number of ancient and modern pictures, the property of Major Corbett Winder, and pictures and drawings from various sources. The highest price realised was for a Romney, portrait of Lady Hamilton, 720 gs. (Vicars). A Watteau, Madame La Maréchale de Luxembourg, sold for 580 gs. (Hodgkins); a Raeburn, portrait of Sir William Forbes of Pitsligo, seventh baronet, 350 gs. (Wallis); a Gainsborough, portrait of Lady Knighton, 370 gs. (H. P. Lane); a Franz Hals, portrait of a gentleman in black dress with white ruff, 280 gs. (Wells); and a portrait by Downman of Lady Gordon, seated before a spinet, 260 gs. (Hodgkins). Berkheyden's The Stradhuis, Amsterdam, with the Nieuwekerk on the left, realised 195 gs. (Buttery); and a Hondecoeter, "The Bird's Concert," 130 gs. (Jefferies). Turner's "The Theatre at Myra" only rose to 160 gs. (Haynes); and a Watteau, portraits of the artist and his friend, M. de Julienne, in a landscape near some ruins, 100 gs. (Hoskin).

In the sale of a collection of pictures and drawings, formerly the property of Mr. C. H. T. Hawkins and Mr. Thomas Statter, at Messrs. Christie's on Monday, three Copley Fieldings brought 192 gs.; and another, "A Coast Scene," by the same artist, 100 gs. (Shand). "The Inn Stable," by Domingo, realised 105 gs. (Wallis); and "Three Young Ladies," by T. Hudson, 100 gs.

Messrs. Sotheby sold on Monday plates from the "Liber Studiorum," together with other engravings by and after Turner. The principal "Liber Studiorum" plates included (first states): Peat Bog, Scotland, £35 (Dunthorne); Raglan Castle, £35 (Ward); Inverary Castle and Town, £22 10s. (Dunthorne); Little Devil's Bridge over the Russ, above Aلتdorf, Switzerland, £20 (Ward); Mount St. Gothard, £20 (Ward). A second state, Æsacus and Hesperie, realised £31 (Ward).

Continuing the Statter sale on Tuesday, Messrs. Christie disposed of the porcelain, and several articles realised good prices. Part of a dessert service sold for 230 gs. (A. Wertheimer); a powdered-blue teapot enamelled with flowers and birds for 205 gs. (Partridge); a pair of cylindrical jars and covers for 125 gs. (A. Smith); and an oval jardinière, with scalloped border, painted with flowers and fruits on marbled grosbleu gold ground for 105 gs. (Willson).

SCIENCE

THE ORIGIN OF LIFE

THE subject of the present essay was discussed in this place more than two years ago, à propos of the then current Kelvin correspondence in the Times. On that occasion I attempted to state what was then and still is the orthodox or generally accepted scientific view. This view is expressed, most comprehensively, in the dogma, omne vivum ex vivo, which expressly denies the "myth," and heresy, or superstition, of the "spontaneous generation" of living from lifeless matter. In accordance with this dogma, I wrote:

"Can we manufacture life now? If we bring the necessary elements and compounds together at the necessary temperature, can we manufacture protoplasm? Is the living cell less distinct than formerly from inorganic matter? Do tales of cells of gelatin all but alive bear any criticism? The answer to all these questions is as emphatic a negative as language will convey. I confess, for myself, that I can scarcely believe it will always be so."

The experiments of Pasteur seemed to be conclusive. Spontaneous generation was a myth. But my friend Dr. Charlton Bastian, F.R.S., had never accepted the dogma omne vivum ex vivo; and had persisted in denying the reality of the logic by which that generalisation was inferred from Pasteur's observations. In brief, the experiments consisted in boiling organic media, preserving them from contamination, and observing that thereafter they exhibited no signs of life. But the criticism might be made that the act of boiling altered certain organic compounds present in the media, which compounds—had they not undergone what the chemist calls degradation, i.e. simplification—might have spontaneously generated life.

That criticism appeared to be conclusively met by adopting a new method of sterilisation—a method which entailed no rise of temperature, and therefore no chemical change in the media. They were not boiled, but merely passed through a Berkefeld filter, which does not permit the passage of even the minutest micro-organism. Thereafter they showed no signs of life. But subsequent research proved that even the mere passage through such a filter was sufficient to cause degradation of the compounds in the media. Therefore, Dr. Bastian maintained, and still maintains, that the possibility of spontaneous generation was not disproved.

Lately Dr. Bastian returned to this question in a volume entitled "Studies in Heterogenesis," which was reviewed in the ACADEMY for December 31, 1904. In that volume it appeared that he had been the victim of grave intolerance on the part of those in authority, that he had been refused a hearing where no hearing of sincere opinions should ever be refused. In more than one place I attempted to draw attention to Dr. Bastian's work. Quite recently, the paper originally refused, now fortified with micro-photographs, was read before the Royal Society.

Some months ago I wrote an article on the "Origin of Life," which appeared in the Pall Mall Magazine for June, in which it was maintained that Dr. Bastian must be heard when he asserts that he has seen, through the microscope, the evolution of mobile bacteria from motionless specks appearing in a medium originally quite clear. It was further maintained that the dogma, omne vivum ex vivo, must be regarded as unproved, on the a priori grounds of evolutionary theory and the doctrine of the Uniformity of Nature: and on the a posteriori grounds of Dr. Bastian's experiments. But I did not dare to express any positive opinion—save that no positive opinion might justly be expressed.

By a coincidence, there appeared in Nature, just after the publication of my article, a most extraordinary communication from the Cavendish Laboratory, Cambridge, which initiates a new and startling phase in the discussion. If any one is prepared to accept the conclusions of Mr. J. B. Burke, it is surely one who had already attempted to direct attention to the views and work of Dr. Bastian: but I confess that it needed many readings of Mr. Burke's letter to persuade me that it would not be possible to detect some fallacy, some experimental error somewhere, even though such a leading authority as Professor Sims Woodhead had failed to do so. I have quoted a phrase about "tales of cells of gelatin all but alive," and here is another such tale.

The important details must be omitted, partly because Mr. Burke's full paper has yet to appear, partly because there is so much else to say. In brief, then, Mr. Burke has taken gelatin and an extract of meat and has prepared the culture and medium which the bacteriologists call beef-gelatin or bouillon. He has exposed this medium to the action of radium, sterilised the whole, and observed the changes produced. Similar tubes, similarly treated, save for the presence of the radium, yielded no changes. There shortly appeared a growth in the gelatin of the first tubes. It looked like a growth of bacteria, but on microscopical examination it proved to consist of minute rounded, nucleated (?!) bodies, such as Professor Woodhead had never seen. (I once had a bad quarter of an hour with Professor Woodhead, which suggests to me that the bacteria he has not seen no one has seen.) Since a name is necessary, we may anticipate, and call these things radiobes, in accordance with the suggestion of their discoverer.

The first possibility is that they were present in the radium from the first, and are a new kind of unicellular organism. That suggestion Mr. Burke's further observations—for which space fails here—make untenable.

The second possibility is that they are crystals. They answer to no known kind of crystal, in appearance, reaction to light, or behaviour.

The third possibility is that they are living organisms produced by the action of radium on the sterilised beef gelatin—omne vivum ex vivo notwithstanding. Let us then recall the best criteria of the presence of life, and apply them in this case. It will not do to say, with Aquinas, that life is "self-movement," for on any intelligible reading of that definition (which, indeed, implies that life is a first cause) radium is alive; the Universe is alive. But we must beware of punning. If a plant is alive in a sense that radium or a crystal is not, how can we express the distinction? Radium has self-movement, and is subject to decay. A crystal grows. On considering this matter—though he had not the facts of radio-activity to help him—Spencer came to the conclusion that the essential character of the phenomenon we call life is the "continuous adjustment of internal to external relations." Mr. Burke applies this definition to the case in point, and thereupon calls these things radiobes. For they not merely grow and decay; they not merely show a structure which looks like the nucleus of a living cell; they grow to a certain limited size—about one seventy-thousandth part of an inch—and then they subdivide. It is a case of the adjustment of internal to external relations. Long ago, Spencer asked himself why living cells are finite in size; why should they divide? He answered that they divide because of the fact that growth implies a diminution of the ratio but never the surface of the cell and its mass. The surface being the means by which the enclosed mass gains its nutriment, a time must come when the ratio so falls that the cell can grow and thrive no longer. Lest it die of inanition, it divides, and thus enlarges the organ of communication with the environment which is its surface. Palpably this is a case of the adjustment of internal to external relations. If an object which possesses this power is not to be judged alive, we must cease to speak or think of life as an entity at all. Now Mr. Burke has photographed the subdivision of these cells. This is a tale of cells of gelatin that does bear criticism.

Supposing that it continues to bear criticism; that the hundreds of gelatin tubes which are now, no doubt, being watched in I know not how many places, each yield the same result as at Cambridge—what may we infer? Certainly not that we know the secret of life; no, not though sympathetic chemistry could already build up, from the very elements, all the compounds contained in such tubes. Nor must we forget that beef-gelatin is itself a product of living matter, and that, even though it could be artificially produced by the chemist, yet there were no laboratories on the cooling earth a hundred million years ago, and if there was no life to produce gelatin, it tells us little of the original origin of life to know that it may now be produced by the submitting of organic compounds to the action of radio-active substances. Merely we may infer, and it is no small inference, that life may be evolved from lifeless matter without the intervention of miracle.

Two points may be noted. Profoundly interesting though it be that living man—note the sequence—should now be able, at will, to produce life in his laboratories, the really important question is as to the origin of those primal forms of life, of which man is the descendant. Now these radiobes of Mr. Burke, when removed from the tube and placed on a slide, disappear on exposure to daylight. After a few days in the dark, they reappear. Presumably the effect of the radio-activity has been to produce compounds which, in suitable conditions, may form living aggregates. In unsuitable conditions these aggregates fall apart, to reform when the conditions again become favourable. Now radium has lately been found to be a constituent of sea-water and of the soil and the rock, and even deep well-water. Radium is almost certainly an element which exists for only a few thousands of years, but is constantly being evolved from uranium. May it be that the continuous production of radio-active bodies and their dissemination in dark places of the earth has made her the mother of all living? Will radium—did radium—produce living things in inorganic matter—sea-water, for instance, or media containing such substances as are found in the geological strata which are believed to have been laid down when the earth was too hot to sustain life?

MUSIC

A DIGRESSION

Two terms are used alike in music and pictorial art to signify their chief means of expression—form and colour. In both arts the form is that which appeals mainly to the intellectual faculties, colour that which appeals to the emotional. But in a picture, from its objective character, the two are far more easily distinguished than in a piece of music. The possibility of a direct appeal to nature puts it within every one's power to differentiate between the form and the colour, to pass a judgment of his own, however erroneous, upon the success or otherwise of the artist's efforts in each direction. The visitor to the Royal Academy has distinct notions, which he loudly proclaims, as to whether or not "that arm is too long" or whether "the sea can look that particular shade of blue." But in music all the efforts of the extreme programmists have failed, and must ever fail to give him a like positive standard of reference. It is true that in a few manifestly far-fetched cases the question may be raised. "Does a battle really make that noise?" one is inclined to ask, when listening to Tchaikovsky's "1812" Overture; but as surely as the answer is "no," does the very putting of the question seem absurd, and to try to gain a first foothold on music by such a means is altogether impossible. It is here that the parallel between painting and music ceases, since both the form and colour of the former are actually that of, or based upon that of, nature, while in the latter they are self-created.

It is generally admitted that the average Englishman at a picture-gallery displays a much more acute feeling for form than for colour. He is quick to detect faults of drawing, to admire impressive or dignified grouping of figures, while he nevertheless overlooks crude contrasts of colour as comparatively unimportant, and he rarely expresses whole-hearted admiration for a picture merely as a piece of colour. It is, therefore, rather surprising at first sight that the present extraordinary wave of interest in music, which has awakened Englishmen from their former indifference, seems to take its beginning rather from a sense of musical colour than from a feeling for form. Perhaps it is necessary to explain to some extent the part which each plays, since the terms are often regarded merely as musicians' words, an important part of a critic's equipment, in fact a two-edged sword with which to smite the young and aspiring composer. But their meaning is really quite simple and identical with their use in painting, the only difference being the material to which they are applied. Form implies shape and balance; that is, the shape of each musical phrase resulting from the pitch and length of its notes, and the balance of one phrase against another. These two elements are necessary to produce any complete artistic form; and consequently it appears that the most primitive musical form must consist of at least two notes: one note will have its own shape expressed in its length of duration, but it requires some counterpart to introduce the element of balance necessary to justify its consideration from a formal standpoint. All questions, then, of form ultimately resolve themselves into two classes—the shape of the individual phrases, and their relation one to another; just as in a picture the individual objects require both to be themselves correctly drawn, inspired with grace and beauty, and to be in a just relation to each other. In music formal beauty results from a balanced treatment of either melody or harmony or, most complete of all, from both.

On the other hand, everything which has to do with the actual quality of tone is classed under the head of colour. Differences of quality are produced by an endless variety of causes. It is with regard to orchestral music that one hears the term most used, because the different qualities of tone produced by different instruments are the most obvious instance of musical colour. But in reality everything which goes to make up what is usually called expression in music is to be classed as colour, from the crudest alternations of soft and loud to the most delicate varieties of tone yielded by the piano in the hands of a Paderewski or the string quartet under Joachim's leadership. The disposition of notes in a chord is also an important factor in determining its colour. The same harmony, say a chord of A major, sustained by stringed instruments, all playing pianissimo, may have a totally different colour according to the different positions of the chord chosen. Compare the first chord of the Prelude to Lohengrin with that which accompanies the words "that sense of ruin" in the Dream of Gerontius. The first is delicately ethereal, as if but newly descended from a light-illuminated heaven; the second ponderous, mysterious, like the foreboding which fills the air before a thunderstorm. The only difference is that the first is sustained by violins in their highest register, the second by all the strings filling every position of the chord from the low C# held by the basses upwards, but both are pianissimo chords of A major played by strings.

Furthermore, actual effects of harmony influence colour to a large extent. It would be impossible to draw a hard and fast line, to say how far harmony is the property of musical form and how far of colour. All one can say is that while the harmony always influences the colour, there are cases where it has scarcely any appreciable effect upon the form. A simple instance of this is to be found in the chord of the diminished seventh which has made the fame and popularity of Barnby's well-known part-song "Sweet and Low." The soprano A, in the first bar, might as well, as far as the form of the piece is concerned, have been harmonised as the third of a triad on F; but, had it been so, that luscious colouring which has enraptured countless choral societies would have been lost. In general it may be said that the harmonic structure of a piece may be the outcome of the composer's sense of formal requirements or of his feeling for effects of colour, while the melodic outline has to do with form, and qualities of tone only with colour.

From these considerations it becomes obvious why people first approach music from an appreciation of its colour rather than its form, since the one makes a direct appeal to the senses, the other appeals to the intellect, which can only begin to be exercised as a result of some education. I do not mean special musical education; a mind sympathetic to music needs only the power of concentration which results from the discipline of general culture to appreciate the perfect poise and balance of such a melody as that which forms the theme of the slow movement of the "Archduke" trio. To enter fully into the beauties of the more complex forms requires, of course, the special knowledge of their peculiarities; just as one must be acquainted with the rules governing the construction of the sonnet to appreciate the individualities of Shakespeare, of Wordsworth, or of Keats in this form, but to enjoy that sense of repose and completeness which one gets from reading a perfectly constructed sonnet does not require any abstruse study of poetics. So with music. The pleasure in its formal beauties requires cultivation, but it is in no way restricted to those who have complete technical knowledge to aid them.

The title with which I have headed these remarks needs a few words of explanation and possibly of justification. It may fairly be asked from what is the digression and whither does it tend. I set out to discuss one simple musical form, that of variations upon a theme. But what I intended simply as a prelude seemed to require fuller elaboration, and a clear mental distinction between the qualities of form and colour in music seemed a necessary preliminary to the discussion of a type of composition in which each plays so important a part. If I may be allowed to trespass so far upon the patience of readers I shall call their attention before long to the development which this form of variations has undergone and the service which it has rendered to music in general, and with its aid I shall try to illustrate some of the principles which I have enunciated herein.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE STENDHAL MONUMENT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—There is a general desire to erect a monument to Henri Beyle (Stendhal) in France, and a Committee has been formed in Paris with that object.

The Committee, thinking that there are probably some admirers of the great novelist and philosopher in England, has requested me to receive any subscriptions, or they can be sent direct to the Secretary: M. A. PAUPP, 50, Rue des Abbesses, Paris 18^e.

PLACES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The writer of the interesting and suggestive article on "Places" in your last issue has touched on the fringe of a very fascinating psychological aspect of literature. That natural environment does greatly influence a man's genius and literary development is amply demonstrated, for instance, in the case of the ill-fated Chatterton, the real precursor of the natural school of poetry of which Cowper, Burns, Wordsworth and Coleridge are the most distinguished representatives. Bristol, the city of his birth, possessed, and still possesses, environs of exceeding beauty, unsurpassed, considering its size, by any city of the British Isles; and as a result there are exquisite touches of nature scattered throughout his too seldom read writings. Take, for example, his graphic description of a thunder-storm in his "Excellente Ballade of Charity," so justly admired by Sir Walter Scott:

"The gathered storm is ripe; the big drops fall;
The sunburnt meadows smoke, and drink the rain;
The coming ghastness doth the cattle 'pall,
And the full-flocks are driving o'er the plain;
Dashed from the cloud, the waters sweep again;
The welkin opes; the yellow lightning flies;
And the hot fiery steam in mighty wreathings dies" . . .

Again, in "The Bristowe Tragedy," how fine its opening:

"The feathered songster chanticleer
Has wound his bugle horn,
And told the early villager
The coming of the morn.

"King Edward saw the ruddy streaks
Of light eclipse the grey;
And heard the raven's croaking
Proclaim the fated day . . ."

Whilst in his "Ælla" are the beautiful lines:

"The budding floweret blushes at the light,
The meads are dappled with the yellow hue;
In daisied mantle is the mountain dight,
The tender cowslip bendeth with the dew;
The trees enleafed, unto heaven straight,
When gentle winds do blow, to whistling din are brought. . ."

The greatest poems, too, of Wordsworth and Coleridge bear witness how truly they were children of the moorland and the mountain. And to come down to our own day, what but the fostering environment of nature produced a Hardy, or enabled Gissing to give the world his "swan-song"?

LA VIE EST BRÈVE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Here is another attempt to translate the untranslatable! But any English version must miss the finish and suggestion of the original:

"How vain is life!
Love's passing sway,
Hate's little strife—
And then—Good-day!
How brief its gleam
An hour's delight,
A moment's dream—
And then—Good-night!"

I should like to suggest to the Protean to set as its next essay in translation Goethe's Wanderer's Song, one of the most impossible of lyrics to turn into satisfactory English. Matthew Arnold once said to me: "We have all tried our hand at it and not one has succeeded in giving the full beauty and value of the original."

SCIENCE AND ART

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I was annoyed at hearing from Mr. Tilney that I had declared art to be a communication of "the artist's pleasurable emotion"; but I find that I had not been so careless. The adjective was inserted in reference to a specific instance. It is needless to say that art may communicate painful emotion—e.g., a performance of Duse's—but the relation between art and happiness (or unhappiness) is still maintained. I do not know any single term save "feeling-tone" to express "happiness or unhappiness"; but all emotion has this quality.

MEREDITH AND BROWNING AND THE CRITICS

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In your number of June 3, Mr. Hugh Chisholm writes: "Even among those who find him too 'difficult,' I take it that Mr. George Meredith has been accepted as the greatest English novelist now living." It seems to me that it is about time the "Man in the Street" had something to say on this subject. For years the name of George Meredith has been pushed in front by the critics, and accordingly honoured by the public—natural cause and effect perhaps; but as one of the reading public, I should like to point out that in my experience, while George Meredith is invariably honoured, he is also invariably unread. Five times I have been led by the reviews to buy his books, which said books still lie upon my shelves unread. Try as I would, I could not get through a quarter of any one of them. I used to think that there was something wanting in my capacity or intelligence which was responsible for this inappreciation, but years of occasional conversation and inquiry on the subject have convinced me that I am only an ordinary human being; for after living among English reading people, and particularly novel-reading people, for many years in various countries, and after having travelled much with Britons across many waters and through many climes, I have never yet met a single man or woman who would admit having read through one of George Meredith's novels. I was once at a dinner-party at which my immediate neighbours were the editors of two London daily papers and three Members of Parliament, one an ex-Minister of the Crown. Not one of these gentlemen had read through a novel by Meredith. At the same time I may remark that I never met any one who had not tried to read one of these novels. Naturally, then, I have now come to the conclusion that the only people who read these novels are the critics.

Also I should like to say a word about Browning. This poet is daily served up in various dishes with every variety of non-piquant eulogistic sauce, but I have yet to find a man or woman in the street who would privately admit having any regard at all for Browning as a poet, though there is an occasional note of admiration for "The Dying Grammarian" and one or two semi-lyrical verses. The fact is that both Browning and Meredith are regarded by most people as "difficult," to use Mr. Chisholm's term, and no "difficult" writer outside the domain of science can have a lasting reputation, if we may judge from experience. It is the simple language of Browne, Jeremy Taylor, Sterne, and Goldsmith that lives, while one forgets even the names of the "difficult" writers, save that of Johnson, who however is now little more than a manikin to be worked by the showman, Boswell. To suggest that a writer may be found difficult is to condemn him as a novelist, and the best poetry is the simplest in idea and construction. You do not want to put a towel round your head to read Shakespeare or Shelley, nor are you desirous of studying variegated syntax when you take up a novel to read. From my experience the greatest living novelists in the opinion of the man in the street, are George Moore and Thomas Hardy, who together would make a Balzac without his tedious parentheses, and of modern poets Swinburne and Phillips (cut out those of his plays written for actor-managers) are regarded as immeasurably above Browning, and far greater than Tennyson, who is indeed being fast relegated into the background so far as the public are concerned. I shall probably be told it is all a question of taste. This is so, perhaps. In the Contemporary Review for May 1904, a writer, after quoting Shakespeare's magically beautiful sonnet commencing with "When forty winters shall besiege thy brow," remarked "How unspeakably dismal and repellent this is." I read in another review that Herbert Spencer thought little of Homer and Dante. Are we to suppose that the critics have such exceptional taste in dealing with Browning and Meredith?

SORDELLO

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The story of Mrs. Carlyle's asking if "Sordello" was a man, a city, or a book has its correlation in one told of Jerrold. He was reading it on recovering from an illness and could make nothing of it. On his wife coming in he passed it on to her to read. After a while he asked her: "Well, what do you think of it?" "I can't make head or tail of it," said she. "Thank God, then," exclaimed J., "I haven't lost my reason after all."
